Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, after the bill was reported the committee in consultation decided to offer another amendment. It is on page 3 of the reported bill, line 19. The words "or the courts" should be stricken out.

Mr. MANN. The committee amendments have not yet been disposed of?

Mr. HOUSTON. No; I thought it would be proper to bring this up before the other committee amendments were acted upon. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that I called attention to this amendment for the purpose of discussion, and he can say what he desires about it.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak on the amendment partially, and I would like to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

On page 3, line 19, strike out the words "or the courts."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, as has been explained by the chairman of the committee, this bill has for its purpose and object the placing of all the public utilities of the Territory of Hawaii under a utilities commission which was created by the Territory in 1913. This bill was adopted by the Legislature of Hawaii in 1915 and submitted to the Congress for its approval.

Under the provisions of the special acts creating the different utilities in this Territory we find that a great many methods have been adopted by Congress relative to the fixing of rates and to the control of these utilities. The commission is authorized under the provisions of the Territorial law to place all of these public utilities under its supervision and control. While this commission has not all of the authority or power that I would like it to have, it has the power of investigation, it has the power to fix rates and charges, and it has the power to compel service of these corporations. On its own motion it may make an investigation and may examine all the books and contracts of the companies, and may fix such rates as the investigation may show to be just and fair to the consumers or users.

This commission consists of three members, appointed by the governor for a term of three years; and it occurs to me that in order that this commission may have the power to give the best service to the people of the Territory all of these public utilities should be placed under its control and supervision, and all should be treated alike.

Now, on the question of the amendments of the committee, the first amendment is found on page 3 and covers any other public utilities not specified in the original act which may be doing business in the Territory. That your committee believed to be necessary in order that some utility company doing business in the Territory, though not having been granted a charter by Congress, should be placed under this commission.

The second amendment, or the last amendment, provides "That nothing herein contained shall in any wise limit the jurisdiction or powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the acts of Congress to regulate commerce within the States and the Territories of the United States." That amendment was offered by your committee because there is a railroad in this Territory which rightly comes under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it is not the purpose to in any manner interfere with the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The other provision following is "That all acts of the public-utility commission herein provided for shall be subject to review by the courts of the Territory." This, we believe, should be adopted, because the power of the courts to review the action of the commission in fixing rates and charges, after making this investigation, should be retained by the courts.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. I yield, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice that the last proviso is that all acts of the public utilities commission shall be subject to review. It has power, has it not, besides the power to fix rates?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think that all acts of a commission like that ought to be subject to the courts?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Purely administrative acts?

Mr. DOWELL. Congress has heretofore placed all of this power within the hands of a superintendent of public works, and no power is given to this commission, except what was in the power conferred by Congress upon the superintendent of public works.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But does the gentleman think that all of the acts, those acts that are purely administrative, not touching rates and not affecting the finances of the company at all, should be subject to court review?

Mr. DOWELL. I suppose the only question that could be raised would be the question of the reasonableness of the order of the commission.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. I yield.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman mean that this bill will give the court the right to fix rates in the future that would be purely legislative?

Mr. DOWELL. No. It is only the right to review the action of the commission in making an order.

Mr. SIMS. Whether it had exceeded its authority?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; whether it was arbitrary or reasonable; and that power, it seems to me, ought always to be lodged with the courts.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. Is any power given to the courts in Hawaii that is not ordinarily given to the courts in the different States of the Union, over the acts and doings and decisions of public utilities commissions?

Mr. DOWELL. I think the act creating the public utility commission provided for an appeal directly to the supreme court, and all of the actions of that commission are by the act itself subject to review by the supreme court of the Territory.

Now I come to the next question, which is the amendment just offered by the chairman of the committee, and which is to strike out of line 19 the words "or the courts." I want to call attention to this amendment, gentlemen, because it is a question which involves the authority and the power of this commission, and also, it affects the power and authority of the courts heretofore granted in the various charters of these public utilities. Under the special charters that have heretofore been granted by the Congress we find that the methods of arriving at the rates and charges have not been uniform.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. HOUSTON. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to read, beginning at line 17, page 3, of the bill, the language which this amendment seeks to change, so that you may thoroughly understand the purpose of the amendment. In line 17, page 3, after the semicolon, I read:

> And all the powers and duties expressly conferred upon or required of the superintendent of public works or the courts by said acts granting said franchises are hereby conferred upon and required of said public-utilities commission and any commission of similar character that may hereafter be created by the laws of said Territory.

This amendment strikes out the words "or the courts"; and by striking out these words this amendment leaves conferred upon the utilities commission all of the powers and duties of the superintendent of public works, and does not confer upon the utilities commission the power and authority heretofore granted, in each special charter granted by Congress, to the courts of the Territory. I heartily favor this amendment, because I am not ready to take from the courts of the Territory the power and authority vested in the courts by the adoption of these special charters, which includes the power of condemnation of property, and also to forfeit the charters of these public utilities. This is a special power conferred upon the courts of the Territory by the acts creating these charters, and I believe the Congress is not ready to take from the courts the power and authority that have been heretofore granted in this respect. For this reason I hope that the amendment will be adopted; and with this amendment adopted, I believe that this bill is in the right direction, and that we are giving to the people of the Territory a better system and a better opportunity of fixing the rates and control of these public utilities than they have heretofore had. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I have just come in, and I do not know what may have been said. I want to ask the gentleman a question in reference to the last proviso in section 1:

> That all acts of the public-utility commission herein provided for shall be subject to review by the courts of the said Territory.

I should like to ask the gentleman in what way that amends or changes the utility law passed by the Territory?

Mr. HOUSTON. It does not change it at all. That is already the law of the Territory, as I understand it, and that clause was inserted in order that this act should not exempt these public-service corporations from the same control that the courts now have.

Mr. LENROOT. Not every act of a utility commission is reviewable by the courts of the States, so far as reasonableness is concerned. Will not the language contained in this bill deprive this utility commission of all power of determining the question of reasonableness and place the original matter in the courts in every instance where the act is complained of?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not think so. Under the law of the Territory now the courts have jurisdiction and the right of review, and in the operation of this law in regard to these public-service corporations no question of that kind has been considered by the courts. They have left the question of fixing rates, and their reasonableness, to the superintendent of public works heretofore, and the proper authorities have had control of that. But this general provision is to cover a case that might arise, and if an injury or an injustice should be done by an act of theirs of that kind, under this law they would have the right to appeal to the supreme court of the Territory.

Mr. LENROOT. The language with reference to the review is very much broader than the language giving to the courts of the United States the power of reviewing the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission and is very much broader than the authority given to the courts in reviewing decisions of State utilities commissions, so far as I know.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To interrogate the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman from Tennessee explain whether there is any organic law authorizing Congress to amend an act of the Hawaiian Legislature?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes; every act. There is no provision in the organic law empowering Congress to do that specifically, but in all these public-service company charters there is a provision reserving to Congress the right to alter, amend, or repeal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then these changes proposed now by the Congress of the United States are in line with the authority heretofore conferred?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes; exactly; and these are the changes that have been passed by the legislature. It is the act of the Territory which is being ratified here.

Unless some one else wishes to speak, I ask the Clerk to read the bill.

Mr. MANN. The Clerk has read the bill.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, may I have just a moment to answer the question which has been asked?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DOWELL. In the provision of the law of the Territory, section 2234, all of the latitude proposed in the committee amendment is given in the original act creating the utilities commission. Your committee have conferred no greater or different power than is reserved by the charter in creating this commission.

The SPEAKER. Unless some gentleman wants to speak on this, the Chair will put the question. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. MANN. There was an amendment offered which has not been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the last amendment reported by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 3, line 19, strike out the words "or the courts."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the committee amendments? If not, they will be put in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOUSTON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ELECTRIC LIGHT AND POWER FRANCHISE IN CERTAIN DISTRICTS OF HAWAII.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 6241) to ratify, approve, and confirm an act amending the franchise granted to H. P. Baldwin, R. A. Wadsworth, J. N. S. Williams, D. C. Lindsay, C. D. Lufkin, James L. Coke, and W. T. Robinson, and now held under assignment to Island Electric Co. (Ltd.), by extending it to include the Makawao district on the island of Maui, Territory of Hawaii, and extending the control of the public utilities commission of the Territory of Hawaii to said franchise and its holder.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the act of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, entitled "An act amending the franchise granted to H. P. Baldwin, R. A. Wadsworth, J. N. S. Williams, D. C. Lindsay, C. D. Lufkin, James L. Coke, and W. T. Robinson, and now held under assignment to Island Electric Co. (Ltd.), by extending it to include the Makawao district on the island of Maui, Territory of Hawaii, and extending the control of the public utilities commission of the Territory of Hawaii to said franchise and its holder," is hereby ratified, approved, and confirmed, and section 857 of chapter 59 of the revised laws of Hawaii, 1915, as approved by an act of Congress approved February 6, 1909, is hereby amended by adding after the words "district of Wailuku" wherever appearing in said section 857 the following words: "And district of Makawao," so that the same shall read as follows:

"SEC. 857. Franchise: H. P. Baldwin, R. A. Wadsworth, J. N. S. Williams, D. C. Lindsay, C. D. Lufkin, James L. Coke, and W. T. Robinson, together with their associates, hereafter called 'The Company,' and their respective successors and assigns, are vested with the right, authority, and privileges, from and after February 6, 1909, to manufacture, sell, furnish, and supply electric light, electric current, or electric power in the district of Wailuku and district of Makawao, on the island of Maui, Territory of Hawaii, for lighting the streets, roads, public or private buildings, or for motive power, or for any other purpose which they may deem advisable, and from time to time for the purposes above mentioned, and subject to the approval and supervision of the boards or officials having charge of said streets or roads to construct, maintain, and operate suitable poles, lines, wires, cables, lamps, lamp posts, conductors, conduits, and such other appliances and appurtenances as may from time to time be necessary for the transmission, distribution, or supply of electricity to consumers thereof, under, along, upon, and over the streets, sidewalks, roads, squares, bridges, alleys, and lanes in said district of Wailuku and district of Makawao, on the island of Maui, and to connect the said lines, wires, and conductors with any manufactory, private or public buildings, lamps, lamp posts, or other structure or object with the place of supply."

SEC. 2. Section 859 of said chapter 59 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, as approved by an act of Congress approved February 6, 1909, is hereby amended by striking out the word "district" in said section 859 and substituting therefor the word "districts," so that the same shall read as follows:

"SEC. 859. Poles, etc., not to interfere with use of streets, etc.: All poles, lines, wires, cables, lamps, lamp posts, conductors, conduits, and other appliances constructed, maintained, or operated under, along, upon, and over the streets, sidewalks, roads, squares, bridges, alleys, and lanes in said districts, on the island of Maui, shall be so constructed, maintained, and operated by the company as to not unnecessarily interfere with the use of such streets, sidewalks, roads, squares, bridges, alleys and lanes by the public."

SEC. 3. Said chapter 59 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, as approved by an act of Congress approved February 6, 1909, is hereby further amended by adding a new section thereto, to be known as section 865A, Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, and reading as follows:

"SEC 865A. This franchise and the person or corporation holding the same shall be subject as to reasonableness of rates, prices, and charges, and in all other respects to the provisions of chapter 128 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, creating a public utilities commission, and all amendments thereof for the regulation of the public utilities in said Territory, and all the powers and duties expressly conferred upon or required of the superintendent of public work or the courts by said act creating said franchise, are hereby conferred upon and required of said public utilities commission and any commission of similar character that may hereafter be created by the laws of said Territory."

SEC. 4. This act shall take effect upon its approval by the Congress of the United States, provided that such approval be given on or before the 4th day of March, 1917.

During the reading of the bill the following occurred:

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, at this point I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point that no quorum is present, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-seven Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. EMERSON) there were 149 ayes and 3 noes.

So the motion for a call of the House was agreed to. The Doorkeeper was ordered to close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms to notify Members.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Adair	Farr	Jones	Patten
Austin	Finley	Keister	Pou
Black	Flynn	Kent	Price
Booher	Gallagher	Kitchin	Rowland
Callaway	Gallivan	Kreider	Sabath
Campbell	Glass	Liebel	Scott, Pa.
Carew	Goodwin, Ark.	Loft	Scully
Clark, Fla.	Graham	Longworth	Sparkman
Conry	Gray, Ala.	McGillicuddy	Stout
Crago	Green, Iowa	McKinley	Sumners
Cullop	Gregg	McLemore	Tague
Dale, N. Y.	Griffin	Maher	Talbott
Dempsey	Guernsey	Miller, Pa.	Winslow
Dyer	Hamill	Moss, Ind.	Wise
Edmonds	Helm	Overmyer
Estopinal	Helvering	Paige, Mass.
Fairchild	Hinds	Parker, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. On this call 368 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to. The doors were opened.

The Clerk proceeded with and completed the reading of the bill.

The following committee amendment was read:

On page 5, at the end of section 3, add the following:

"Provided, That all acts of the public utilities commission herein provided for shall be subject to review by the courts of the Territory of Hawaii."

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, this is an act to ratify and approve an act amending this franchise in the Territory of Hawaii, and I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. WATKINS.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, the only object of this bill is to extend the right of this franchise from the district of Wailuku into the district of Makawao, a district adjoining.

The original charter was granted to H. P. Baldwin and others in 1909 for the first district named. It was at that time understood that Baldwin & Co. were to have the benefit of the electric power of the Baldwin Sugar Co., but the Baldwins transferred the right to the electric company, and in this transfer this reservation of power, which had been contemplated would be used by the company, was not secured, and it threw a very onerous burden on the company and made the conditions such that they were unable to proceed with the operation of the work within that limited territory. Being thus embarrassed and hampered on account of the limited territory, they thought proper to ask the legislature of the Hawaiian Islands to grant them the right to extend the franchise to the district of Makawao, and the charter was so extended. A grant was given to the electric company, and this simply is to ratify the act of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii. There are no complications, nothing except the extension of that right. It does transfer all of the rights to the public utility commission which has recently been created there to take charge of all public utilities.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the bill provides that a certain act of the Territorial legislature, naming the act by title, "is hereby ratified, approved, and confirmed," and then goes on to provide that section 857 of chapter 59 of the revised laws, and so forth, is amended to read "as follows," and then in other sections of the bill provides that other sections of the Territorial law be amended to read "as follows," and so forth. Is it supposed that the Territorial act, which is ratified and approved, is set out in the bill?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is not what the bill says.

Mr. WATKINS. That is what the original act says, and that is copied in the bill.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is satisfied with it, I am not going to complain; but it sets out the title of the Territorial act and says that it is ratified, approved, and so forth, and then goes on and says "and section 587 of chapter 59 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii * * * is hereby amended," and so forth.

Mr. WATKINS. That is what is reenacted in this bill—the section the gentleman now refers to.

Mr. MANN. The bill differentiates between the act of the legislature which is approved and the section which is amended.

Mr. WATKINS. This charter is simply granted under the statute law of the Territory.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, if I may have his attention, that I have before me the statute referred to there. Chapter 59 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii is the charter granted to H. P. Baldwin and others. First, there is the franchise; second, the operation, subject to regulations, which is 858; then 859 provides how they must set their poles, and 860 provides for inspection of plants, 861 for being responsible for negligence, and 862 for forfeiture of franchise, and so forth. This bill simply ratifies all of that, but extends it to additional territory, gives them a little more territory to operate in.

Mr. MANN. I am speaking about the form of the bill, which plainly says that a certain act, which it names, is ratified, approved, and confirmed, and as an additional proposition that section 857 is amended by adding certain words, and in section 2 it provides that section 859 is amended by adding certain words, and chapter 59 is further amended by adding a new section. There is nothing in the bill to indicate that you ratify and approve an act and afterwards amend certain other sections. It is all supposed to relate to the same matter. The form of the bill will leave it in dispute as to what is meant.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, while there is no particular objection to having the suggestion of the gentleman incorporated by way of amendment, the only idea is that all the law on that subject matter would remain intact except as amended, and as amended the amendment is stated in the bill. There can not be any doubt about it. There is no reason particularly for inserting the amendment. It will not add to or subtract from the bill. I think it is sufficient, but if there is an amendment offered to that effect we will not object to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, if no one else desires to speak, I will ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOUSTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HARBOR COMMISSIONERS OF HAWAII.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill H. R. 3042, to ratify, approve, and confirm sections 1, 2, and 3 of an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory, and amending the laws relating thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 1, 2, and 3 of act 169 of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, 1915, entitled "An act to amend chapter 49 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, relating to harbors, by amending sections 683, 685, 687, and 691, and by adding one new section thereto to be known as section 691 A," approved by the governor of the Territory April 26, 1915, be, and the same are hereby, ratified, approved, and confirmed, as follows:

"SECTION 1. Section 683 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 683. Board of harbor commissioners: Except as otherwise provided by law, all ocean shores below mean high-water mark, shore waters, and navigable streams, and all harbors and roadsteads, and all harbor and water-front improvements, belonging to or controlled by the Territory of Hawaii, and all shipping within such harbors, roadsteads, waters, and streams shall be under the care and control of a board of harbor commissioners. Said board shall consist of five members, one of whom shall be the superintendent of public works of the Territory who shall be chairman, ex officio, and four shall be appointed by the governor as provided in section 80 of the organic act. Such commissioners shall be appointed for terms of four years or the unexpired periods thereof, in such manner that the terms of two commissioners shall expire every second year. Said terms shall begin on the 1st day of July: Provided, however, That upon the first appointments two of said commissioners shall be appointed for terms ending June 30, 1913, and two for terms ending June 30, 1915.'

"SEC. 2. Section 685 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 685. Powers and duties of board: Except as otherwise provided by law, said board shall have and exercise all the powers and shall perform all the duties which may lawfully be exercised by or under the Territory of Hawaii relative to the control and management of the shores, shore waters, navigable streams, harbors, harbor and water-front improvements, ports, docks, wharves, quays, bulkheads, and landings belonging to or controlled by the Territory, and the shipping using the same, and shall have the authority to use and permit and regulate the use of the wharves, piers, bulkheads, quays, and landings belonging to or controlled by the Territory for receiving or discharging passengers and for loading and landing merchandise, with a right to collect wharfage and demurrage thereon or therefor, and, subject to all applicable provisions of law, to fix and regulate from time to time rates for services rendered in mooring vessels, charges for the use of moorings belonging to or controlled by the Territory, rates or charges for the services of pilots, wharfage or demurrage, rents or charges for warehouses or warehouse space, for office or office space, for storage of freight, goods, wares, and merchandise, for storage space, for the use of donkey engines, derricks, or other equipment belonging to the Territory, under the control of the board, and to make other charges except toll or tonnage charges on freight passing over or across wharves, docks, quays, bulkheads, or landings. The board shall likewise have power to appoint and remove clerks, wharfingers and their assistants, pilots and pilot-boat crews, and all such other employees as may be necessary, and to fix their compensation; to make rules and regulations pursuant to this chapter and not inconsistent with law; and generally shall have all powers necessary fully to carry out the provisions of this chapter.

"'All moneys appropriated for harbor improvements, including new construction, reconstruction, repairs, salaries, and operating expenses, shall be expended under the supervision and control of the board, subject to the provisions of this chapter and of chapter 100. All contracts and agreements authorized by law to be entered into by the board shall be executed on its behalf by its chairman.

"'The board shall prepare and submit annually to the governor a report of its official acts during the preceding calendar year, together with its recommendations as to harbor improvements throughout the Territory.'

"SEC. 3. Section 687 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 687. Rules and regulations: The board may from time to time make, alter, amend, and repeal such rules and regulations not inconsistent with law as it may deem necessary respecting the manner in which all vessels may enter and moor, anchor, or dock in the shore waters, navigable streams, harbors, ports, and roadsteads of the Territory, or move from one dock, wharf, bulkhead, quay, landing, anchorage, or moorings to another within such waters, streams, harbors, ports, or roadsteads; the examination, guidance, and control of pilots and harbor masters and their assistants, and their conduct while on duty; the embarking or disembarking of passengers; the expeditious and careful handling of freight, goods, wares, and merchandise of every kind which may be delivered for shipment or discharged on the wharves, docks, quays, bulkheads, or landings belonging to or controlled by the Territory; and defining the duties and powers of carriers, shippers, and consignees respecting passengers, freight, goods, wares, and merchandise in and upon such wharf, landing, dock, quay, or bulkhead. The board may also make further rules and regulations for the safety of the docks, wharves, landings, quays, bulkheads, and harbor and water-front improvements belonging to or controlled by the Territory.

"'Said board may also, from time to time, make, alter, amend, and repeal such rules not inconsistent with law as shall be deemed necessary for the proper regulation and control of all shipping in the harbors, shore waters, and navigable streams belonging to or controlled by the Territory, and of the entry, departure, mooring, and berthing of vessels therein, and for the regulation and control of all other matters and things connected with shipping in all such harbors, shore waters, and navigable streams; and rules and regulations to prevent the throwing into such harbors, shore waters, and navigable streams of rubbish, refuse, garbage, or other substances liable to make such harbors, shore waters, and navigable streams unsightly, unhealthful, or unclean, or liable to fill up or shoal or shallow such harbors, shore waters, and streams, and likewise to prevent the escape of fuel or other oils into such harbors, shore waters, and streams, either from any vessel or from pipes or storage tanks upon the land.

"'Any rules and regulations so made shall be published by said board in the manner prescribed for the promulgation of the laws of the Territory, and upon such publication shall have the force and effect of law.'"

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "confirmed" insert the words "with an amendment."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "except as otherwise provided by law, all" and insert the word "all."

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that committee amendment and instead thereof amend line 3, page 2, by inserting after the word "hereby" the word "amended."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to withdraw the committee amendment and substitute one which the Clerk will report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the other committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "except as otherwise provided by law, said" and insert the word "Said."

Page 6, insert as a new section the following:

"SEC. 4. The jurisdiction and powers hereby conferred on the board of harbor commissioners are subject to such restrictions as may be imposed by the statutes of the Territory of Hawaii, and shall be exercised in accordance with the provisions thereof."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the remaining committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read as follows:

A bill to ratify, approve, and confirm sections 1, 2, and 3 of an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory, as herein amended, and amending the laws relating thereto.

On motion of Mr. HOUSTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is that all that the gentleman's committee has?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I report a bill to supply urgent deficiencies for the fiscal year 1915 and prior years, and for other purposes. (H. Rept. 57.)

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves all points of order. The bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that I intend to call up the bill to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York gives notice he is going to call up the bill to-morrow? What time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Right after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. Just after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk.

The Clerk will continue the call of committees.

BUREAU OF LABOR SAFETY.

When the Committee on Labor was called,

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 153, known as the bill to create a bureau of labor safety in the Department of Labor.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 153) to create a bureau of labor safety in the Department of Labor.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 153) to create a bureau of labor safety in the Department of Labor.

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created in the Department of Labor a bureau of labor safety. There shall be a commissioner of labor safety, who shall be the head of said bureau, to be appointed by the President, and who shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum. There shall also be in the said bureau a chief clerk and such experts, special agents, clerks, and other employees as may be authorized from time to time by appropriation or other law. It shall be the province and duty of such bureau, under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, to make general and special investigation and examination of labor-safety plans and devices of all kinds and the need therefor, generally and specially, and also the study of devices and methods for the prevention of vocational diseases, and to make public the results of such investigation, examination, and study from time to time. It shall be the duty of the Public Health Service in its investigation of vocational diseases and their causes to cooperate with such bureau upon request of the Secretary of Labor. It shall also be the province and duty of such bureau, under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, to gather, compile, publish, and supply useful information concerning the use of labor-safety plans and devices and vocational diseases in the industries of the United States and elsewhere.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, very briefly stated, the object of this bill, which received the approval of the House in the last Congress but failed of the necessary attention in the Senate, is to establish in the Department of Labor a function in the nature of a clearing house of information with reference to devices and methods calculated to prevent personal injury and loss of life in industrial occupations.

The ratio of accidents to the number employed in the United States, I regret to say, ranks very much higher than it does in the countries of Europe. It would not be exaggerating the difference to say that the tendency in our industries is to kill and injure at least twice as many for a day's employment as experience shows abroad.

As Members of the House well know, proper attention has at last been given in this country to the subject of these accidents in the direction of making compensation to the victims, at least two-thirds of the States having enacted legislation known as accident-compensation legislation.

It is probably not an exaggerated statement to say, although there is no definite computation, that the accident bill in a financial sense only will mean a loss to the industries of the country of $150,000,000 a year when these accident-compensation bills have become adopted and applied by all the States.

So, outside of the humane motive of preventing the injury to the victim himself, there is a financial phase of the matter of proportion calling for attention, and the very best attention, on our part. It is to be observed, Mr. Speaker, that in countries where the accident-compensation systems have gone into effect—and I have in mind the British railways particularly—the effect of penalizing the accident by requiring compensation to the victim, without reference to the fact of negligence, has been to cut down and reduce the number of accidents very materially. When the motives of humanity and the financial interests are both joined, it has been found that methods and devices preventive of accident have been called into activity with the splendid results I have suggested in the case of the British railways.

I need not say more—perhaps I was not called upon to say as much—with reference to legislation the commendable character of which appears so obviously on its own face.

I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the author of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not say very much concerning the bill, because I believe there is no opposition to it. I think there is no service we can render that is more valuable to humanity than to save the life and limb which otherwise would be lost by accident in the ordinary course of enterprise, and the Government can well afford to have experts somewhere in the Government who can give advice and aid to manufacturers in the effort to adopt safety appliances and devices which will prevent accidents causing injury or death.

That is the design of this bill. I wish to thank the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] and the other members of the Committee on Labor, which I regard as one of the most important committees of the House, for giving early attention to this subject.

Mr. Speaker, there has been on the part of some in the department and on the part of some gentlemen outside of the department, who are interested in the working of the department, some little fear that this bill might take away from some of the other official bodies of the Government authority which had been conferred upon them by act of Congress. While I do not think that the bill does that, in order to obviate any question and to dispel that fear, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following proviso, to wit:

"Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held to repeal, modify, or affect any other act of Congress in force at the time of the passage of this act."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHILD LABOR.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, if now in order, I wish to call up the bill H. R. 8234, known as the Keating child-labor bill, and in that connection I should like to secure the acquiescence of the House, if I may, to an arrangement tentatively entered into by the friends and opponents of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state the arrangement?

Mr. LEWIS. The majority report on the bill has been printed and is available, but the minority views have not been printed, and yesterday the House gave the minority five calendar days in which to prepare them. I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the House that further consideration of the bill after reading the first section be deferred until Calendar Wednesday next, and that any time lost to-day should be reserved in favor of the bill for a later occasion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill and first section.

The Clerk read as follows:

To prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in interstate commerce the product of any mine or quarry situated in the United States, which has been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of children under the age of 16 years, or the product of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment situated in the United States which has been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of children under the age of 14 years or by the labor of children between the ages of 14 and 16 years who work more than eight hours in any one day, or more than six days in any one week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m. or before the the hour 7 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] asks unanimous consent that this bill go over until a week from to-day.

Mr. LEWIS. And that the time surrendered to-day, which is about three hours, be reserved for any subsequent Calendar Wednesday for the use of the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER. Is this the last bill that the Committee on Labor is going to call up to-day?

Mr. LEWIS. It is.

The SPEAKER. And that the remainder of this legislative day, say about three hours, although there is nothing fixed about the length of the day, shall be reserved by the Committee on Labor for the consideration of this bill. Has the Chair stated it right?

Mr. LEWIS. On the following Calendar Wednesday. That would be two weeks from to-day.

The SPEAKER. Next Calendar Wednesday is next Wednesday, and not two weeks from to-day.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Labor would have the balance of to-day and next Calendar Wednesday under the new rule. What they want to do is to give up the balance of to-day and, if necessary, have the three hours on the second Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wanted to understand. The rule provides that the Committee on Labor, for instance, have two Wednesdays hand running if it has business. Now, the gentleman asks that this be postponed until next Calendar Wednesday, and that the remainder of this legislative day, about three hours, shall be granted to that committee two weeks from to-day, provided the committee needs it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Rather, I wish to ask for information. As a matter of fact, if we do not object to this at this time, can the objection be raised on next Wednesday as to the extension of this time?

The SPEAKER. It can not, if the committee agrees to do it by unanimous consent to-day.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I object.

Mr. LEWIS. This is a concession to the gentleman's view of the matter. We are ready to-day to take the affirmative argument on this subject and make our argument to the House on this bill, and the minority make their argument next Wednesday, but at the request of the minority itself the majority argument is to be deferred until next Wednesday.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me, before he interposes his objection?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from South Carolina withhold a moment?

Mr. RAGSDALE. One moment.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina and to the House that the child-labor bill, which is the next bill that would be reported under the call, was reported from the committee on day before yesterday. The views of the minority of that committee have not been prepared, and on yesterday this House accorded to the minority members the right within five legislative days to present their views. It so happens that Calendar Wednesday comes to-day. The bill has been reported, and the report is before the House, but the views of the minority are not before the House. Gentlemen entertaining the minority views very naturally objected to debate upon the proposition to-day before the issue could be joined and their views presented to the House. Under those circumstances the committee was anxious that it should not lose its place upon the calendar, but at the same time that the discussion should not be precipitated when the record was thus incompletely made up. For that reason I, and gentlemen like-minded with myself, requested the chairman of the committee, in order to preserve his place upon the calendar, to permit the committee to give way to-day and ask unanimous consent that its place on the calendar should be carried over until next Wednesday; and in the meanwhile the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], the chairman of the Committee on Roads, might take up the road bill, which has been reported to the House, so that having gone over until next Wednesday whatever time had been lost to the Labor Committee, by reason of not taking up this question this afternoon, should be accorded to it on next Calendar Wednesday. I think that is a concession on the part of the committee to the views entertained by myself and the views which I understand the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] entertains.

It will be better, in my judgment, that this discussion be postponed until next Wednesday. In fact, I think it would be unjust if it were not postponed. For that reason I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will see that the postponement of this discussion at this time makes for a fairer and better opportunity for gentlemen entertaining his views to present them than could be had if this matter is precipitated at this time; and therefore I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the liberty of stating to all the Members—some of them are not here—that this Calendar Wednesday rule about debate has been radically changed, and only two hours of general debate are now allowed on one of these bills.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask that the other gentlemen who have bills on the calendar that might be called up whether they would be willing to practically dispense with to-day as Calendar Wednesday and go ahead with the roads bill, so as not to involve matters by having the bills go over. I think they are in very good shape to get their bills up very soon anyhow.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, as the Committee on the Revision of the Laws is the next committee on the calendar, I will state that our committee has no objection to that arrangement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to dispensing with Calendar Wednesday for the rest of the day?

There was no objection.

RURAL POST ROADS.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7617, the rural post-roads bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7617, known as the rural post-roads bill, with Mr. RUCKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7617, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill by title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7617) to provide that the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall, in certain cases, aid the States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall, in certain cases, aid the States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads; that for the purposes of this act the term "rural post road" shall be held to mean any public road over which rural mail is or might be carried outside of incorporated cities, towns, and boroughs having a population exceeding 2,000, and in said cities, towns, and boroughs having a population exceeding 2,000 along streets and roads where the houses average more than 200 feet apart; that not more than $25,000,000 shall be appropriated under the provisions of this act for any fiscal year.

SEC. 2. That out of any appropriation made under the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall deduct the sum which he shall deem necessary to defray the expenses of his department in the administration of this act and apportion the balance of said appropriation for expenditure under the provisions of this act in the several States in the following manner: $65,000 to each State and one half of the remainder in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the population of all of the States as shown by the latest available Federal census and the other half of such remainder in the ratio which the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes in such State bears to the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes of all the States as shown by the latest available report of the Postmaster General.

SEC. 3. That as soon as may be after the passage of any act making appropriations under the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall prepare and file in his office a statement showing the amount of such appropriation he has set apart to defray the expense of his department in the administration of this act, and the amount of the balance which will be available for expenditure in each State, and transmit a copy of such statement to the State highway department of each State which has such a department, and to the governor of each State which has not such a department; that the State highway department of any State, after receiving such statement, may apply to the Secretary of Agriculture for aid under the provisions of this act in the construction or maintenance of any rural post road in such State; and if, in his judgment, such road is one to the proposed construction or maintenance of which aid should be given under the provisions of this act, then he shall request such State highway department to furnish him with surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost of said proposed construction or maintenance, and any other information which he may consider proper; that he shall examine said surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost and determine what would be the reasonable cost of such construction or maintenance and what amount of aid will be given under the provisions of this act to such proposed construction or maintenance, which shall in no case be less than 30 nor more than 50 per cent of what he has so determined would be the reasonable cost of such proposed construction or maintenance, and shall forthwith transmit to said State highway department a written statement of his said determinations; that upon receipt of such written statement the said State highway department may transmit to the Secretary of Agriculture a statement in writing notifying him that such proposed construction or maintenance will be undertaken upon the terms proposed; that thereupon the proper authorities of the State may, in accordance with the laws of such State, commence and prosecute said construction or maintenance in substantial compliance with said surveys, plans, and specifications; that when the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that said construction or maintenance of said road has been finished in substantial compliance with said surveys, plans, and specifications he shall cause to be paid to the proper authority of said State whatever remains unpaid of the amount which he has stated, as hereinbefore provided, would be given to aid said State in said proposed construction or maintenance of said road; that the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, from time to time make payments upon such construction or maintenance as the same progresses, but these payments, including previous payments, if any, shall in no case be more than the pro rata part of the United States of the value of labor and materials which have been put into such construction or maintenance.

SEC. 4. That all construction and maintenance of roads under the provisions of this act shall be under the supervision and control of the State highway departments of the several States: Provided, That until January 1, 1920, the amount which has been apportioned to be expended in any State which has no State highway department shall be available for expenditure in such State in such manner as shall be agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and the governor of such State; that the Secretary of Agriculture may make, or cause to be made, such inspection and examinations of any road constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act as he shall deem necessary, and he may prescribe what reports shall be made to him by the State highway department of any State in relation to any road in such State to the construction or maintenance of which aid under the provisions of this act has been given or sought, when such reports shall be made, and the form and subject matter of the same; that the Secretary of Agriculture shall have power to employ such assistants, clerks, and other persons in the city of Washington and elsewhere to purchase such materials and supplies and to prescribe such rules and regulations for the administration of this act as he may consider expedient.

SEC. 5. That the necessary culverts and bridges shall be considered as parts of the roads constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act; that the roads which may be constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act shall include earth, sand-clay, sand-gravel, and other common types of roads, as well as roads of higher classes, one of the purposes of this act being to encourage and promote the improvement of a general system of roads leading from cities, towns, and railway stations into the adjacent farming communities.

SEC. 6. That all payments of money from appropriations under the provisions of this act shall be made by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn by the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 7. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage.

[Mr. SHACKLEFORD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill. I am in favor of Federal aid for highways. I believe it is correct in principle, and I believe there is an overwhelming sentiment in the United States in favor of Federal aid to roads.

Our road system is wholly inadequate to meet the demands of this twentieth-century civilization. We inherit our road system from England, a system that England discarded in the seventeenth century. The great fault with our present road system is that it places upon the rural population the burden of building and maintaining 2,000,000 miles of roads, and then we criticize the farmer because he does not give us better roads.

We have made more advancement in the good-road movement in the last 10 years than we did in the preceding 50 years. The reason is that many of the various States have created highway commissions and have entered upon a system of State aid. We want that supplemented by national aid.

The advocates for national roads insist upon several things. One of them is that the amount appropriated by the General Government will be equitably distributed and divided among the various States.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. That is one of the very points that the minority of the committee makes, that this money is not equitably divided. Will the gentleman discuss that?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes; I will discuss that. The second requisite is that the National Government sees that every dollar expended by the National Government goes on the roads and is expended in an economical way, so that the Government gets a dollar's worth of road for every dollar invested.

I believe this bill meets those requirements.

First, in regard to the apportionment of the money appropriated the bill carries an appropriation of $25,000,000.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not true that this bill does not carry any appropriation at all?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. The $25,000,000 is named in the bill.

Mr. MANN. It is an authorization.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Just simply an authorization. That is correct. Now, we propose to divide this $25,000,000 and apportion it as follows:

First, we give each State as a unit $65,000. Then, after deducting the amount that it costs to administer the law, we take 50 per cent of the balance of the money and divide it among the several States according to the mileage of the star routes and rural routes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman what impelled the committee to reach the conclusion that $65,000 should be given to each State as an initial amount.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I will answer that in this way: We thought that in the apportionment of this fund we would apportionate it in three ways. I will show the gentleman that it is equitable that States which have not a great population or a great mileage, but want to get good roads and want to improve the roads they have, should have something to start with; so we thought that to give each State the amount of $65,000 was simply fixing an arbitrary amount that we would give to each State for that purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. What is going to be done with that $65,000, and what is it given to the States for?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. It is for roads.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the consideration?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I will answer the gentleman's question in arguing in favor of these other apportionments. It supplements those, and the three apportionments make it so that every State is reasonably provided for.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. How is the $65,000 distributed in the States themselves?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I will get to that in a moment. The $65,000, and all the amounts given to the States, are distributed by the highway commissions of the States, if they have highway commissions, together with the Secretary of Agriculture. I will explain that further on.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the gentleman answer my question.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I will answer the gentleman's question within the next minute or two. I want simply to speak of these other apportionments.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I decline to yield until I have made a statement. Then I shall be pleased to do so.

As I said, the first part we divide among the States as units, giving each one $65,000. Next, we distribute 50 per cent of the remainder among the States, according to the mileage of rural routes and star routes.

The third apportionment is to distribute the balance among the several States, according to their population.

This apportionment I believe is fair. It gives the large State with a medium population a fair show on the road mileage; it gives the small State with small road mileage and a large population a fair apportionment on the basis of population, and it gives States as a unit $65,000 to equalize the apportionment. It gives the small State that has a sparse population and a rather small mileage something along on that line. So that when you take the three modes of apportionment—figure them out—as you will see in the report, it gives each State in the Union a fair apportionment of the funds appropriated by the Federal Government.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Did I understand that each State is to get $65,000 regardless of whether it has any highway commission or not?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Without respect to the road mileage or the population?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Take the case of a State where they have no highway commission and spend no money on roads, and all the money they get is $65,000. What will they do with it?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. The bill provides that where they have no highway commission the governor of the State shall distribute the fund, and they will have to have a highway commission by 1920 or they will get no more money. Twenty years ago only 10 States in the Union had highway commissions, and now they all have highway commissions except 8.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will allow me, the gentleman said that the State must have a highway commission by 1920. Is it the purpose of this bill not to distribute any money until 1920?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Oh, no; but I say until that time, it is to give the States a little time to prepare themselves.

Mr. MADDEN. And in the meantime what happens to the $65,000?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I have stated that the governor of the State, with the Secretary of Agriculture, will say upon what roads it shall go.

Mr. MADDEN. How many miles of road will $65,000 build?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. The State gets $65,000, but it also comes in on the road-mileage apportionment and also the apportionment under population, so that they all get considerably more than the $65,000.

Mr. MADDEN. What was the scientific basis upon which the committee fixed the sum of $65,000 as necessary for each State?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Sixty-five thousand dollars, the amount specified in the bill, is purely an arbitrary amount fixed by the committee, but taken with the other two apportionments, it makes a very fair apportionment of the amount of the fund. I can not conceive any better way of apportioning funds for roads than the number of miles of road as one element; I can not imagine any better apportionment to go with it than the population, the number of people who are going to travel over the roads. But we want to encourage the small State, the State that has not many roads, has a sparse population, and so we give each State a certain amount as a unit. But the three apportionments taken together, according to the best experts we have, make as fair an apportionment as you can have.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Certainly.
Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the apportionment that you have just spoken of to be taken as the future purpose for road building?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As an initial appropriation?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman was a member of the Committee on Roads in the last Congress.
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. ROGERS. In the bill passed in the last Congress there is no specific appropriation for a flat amount.
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes; the apportionment was practically the same as in this bill.
Mr. ROGERS. There was $25,000,000 authorized, to be divided into halves, and there were two bases for apportioning the halves.
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. The apportionment in that bill was practically the same as it is in this. Now, on the apportionment principle, there are a great many ways which could be suggested for this apportionment. Many of them would be probably fair, but I believe that, taking these three ways of apportioning the fund, it makes a very fair apportionment.

The next requirement is that the money which the Federal Government appropriates shall be fairly invested and economically invested, and not wasted. Under this bill, when the highway commission, if it has one, and if not, the governor of the State, brings out a system of roads and presents it to the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture looks over the system of roads and determines what roads are to have Federal aid and whether that aid should be 30 per cent or 50 per cent or any per cent between those two amounts. He also specifies where the roads shall go and what kind of roads shall be built. After that is done, if it is accepted by the State highway commission and the State builds the road, after the roads are built, the facts and data are presented to the Secretary of Agriculture. He looks over the figures. He is having roads built in the 48 different States of the Union, and he knows just what kind of roads can be built and how much they cost.

If he thinks the road has been built in an economical way, in substantial compliance with the plans and specifications presented, he says you can have 50 per cent, or the per cent he has agreed upon. If he makes up his mind that they have been extravagant, that the road has cost more than it ought to have cost, then, under this bill he has the right to give that State commission 50 per cent of what that road ought to have cost. So, no matter if you build a road that costs $5,000 a mile which ought to have only cost $4,000 a mile you will only get $2,000.

You do not get what your road cost, but you get 50 per cent of what your road ought to cost. That is going to have this effect: Every State commission that builds a road for which it is going to receive Government aid, which is cut down by the Secretary of Agriculture in the amount, will be subject to criticism by the people of the State, and the people of the State will go to the commissioner and ask him why he did not build the roads more cheaply. It is going to be a check on every State highway department.

Roads being built in this way in various places in 48 States is going to give the Secretary of Agriculture and his expert engineers data upon which he can rely and from which he can tell very quickly, many times without inspection whatever, whether the road has cost more than it ought to cost. The Secretary of Agriculture can offer suggestions to the various highway commissions, and under the powers given him in this bill he is absolutely sure that every dollar that the Government expends on the roads shall be met by a dollar that the State expends, and the Government and State will thus get two dollars' worth of road for every dollar that the Government puts in.

Mr. Chairman, people term this a pork-barrel proposition. Under a bill of this kind, why can not the Secretary of Agriculture see to it that roads are constructed just as cheaply as the Secretary of the Navy can see to it that battleships are constructed more cheaply than they can be constructed in any private navy yard? If this Government can do other matters in an economical way, why can not it build roads in an economical way? I think it can.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In the construction of highways, bridges and culverts are a considerable item of expense?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This bill provides for building highways only?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. No; it includes bridges and culverts as a part of the highway system. Some of the Eastern States were opposed to this bill before and are opposed to it now. They say that they are raising more money by taxation than they are getting back. This matter of internal improvements has been going on ever since this Government was started, and the interior of the country, the great agricultural part of the country, has had very few of these internal improvements, and I can not imagine any internal improvement that is going to benefit as many people as will the improvement of our highways. [Applause.] The only questions are whether this money that is expended will be expended in an economical and in an intelligent manner upon the roads, and whether it is fairly apportioned. Those ought to be the only two questions considered.
Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. POWERS. As I understand the gentleman, there are three methods of apportionment?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. POWERS. Sixty-five thousand dollars arbitrarily fixed, population, and the length of the rural and star routes?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. POWERS. All of these three are to be put together into an apportionment to any one State?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. POWERS. That being true, would it not be unfair to the great State of New York to give it only $65,000 and to give $65,000, say, to a State like Delaware?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I do not think it would be any more unfair than to give two United States Senators to the State of New York and two to the State of Nevada.
Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. REAVIS. The basis of apportionment to the State is, first, population?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. REAVIS. And next, the length of routes?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. REAVIS. What relation does the arbitrary appropriation of $65,000 to each State bear to either one of those necessities?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. It simply helps the young States, like many of the Western States that are just building roads and have not a large road mileage and have not a large population. In figuring up the apportionment under the two items spoken of, it will be seen that some States that need roads, when they complete their roads it will help the whole road system of the United States, and those States are very poor and ought to have something upon some other basis than simply population and road mileage.

Mr. REAVIS. The only basis, as I understand it, then of the $65,000, is that it is an arbitrary gift on the part of this committee?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Simply that each State as a unit shall have a fair amount.
Mr. REAVIS. Not based upon any necessity?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. It is based on necessity, and helps out these other two apportionments.
Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. SLOAN. What jurisdiction is maintained by the Government after the road has been established to see that it has been maintained or continued?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. This amount provides for maintenance and construction of the roads.
Mr. SLOAN. But after the money has been expended by the Federal Government.
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. After it has been expended the States themselves have to look after it.
Mr. SLOAN. And the United States gives up this money and has no authority whatever over that road in any way for any length of time after having made the contribution.
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. No.
Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman think that is fair to the Federal Government?
Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I think that is fair. I think it is for the interest of every locality to keep up the roads, for the interest of the State to keep up the roads, and when the State puts in a dollar as against a dollar that the Government puts in it is going to see that those roads are kept up in reasonable repair.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Suppose we pass this bill, where does the committee figure that they are going to get the money? How are you going to get the money first in the Treasury of the United States to start with? Under present conditions, where does the committee figure out it is going to get the money?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. We figure out we will get it in the same place where we get it for rivers and harbors——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. We have not been getting it.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. And are going to get it for the post offices. We were informed within a day or two we are going to have a lot of Federal post-office buildings, which are all right, probably; and we get the money for them from the same source; but we think this internal improvement is certainly more imperative than the improvement of many of our rivers and harbors or the building of post-office buildings at small towns.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say to the gentleman, as a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, if we get the money in the same place we have been getting the money under this administration for the improvement of rivers and harbors it is a useless performance to pass the bill of the gentleman. We have not been getting it.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. In the Sixty-third Congress the committee got over $50,000,000, and we only ask $25,000,000. Then we passed a bill appropriating $30,000,000 for a railroad up in Alaska for the benefit of 60,000 people.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And we have not got it yet.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. We think it is not more than fair to the great rural population of this country which, when you include towns of 2,500 inhabitants, makes over half the population, 50,000,000 people, are entitled at this time to some consideration. That is the idea of this great improvement that it is going to help everybody. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentlemen yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am in hearty sympathy with what the gentleman is saying, and I understood him to say a moment ago that we are going to have a lot of Federal buildings. I would like to know where the gentleman gets that information. I am a member of that committee, and I have not heard of it.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. The other day the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] gave a very learned speech here and told us the fact that we could look for Federal buildings.

Mr. GORDON. As far as he was concerned.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. And that is all right; I am not questioning it.

Mr. LANGLEY. I hope the gentleman is right.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I am not questioning these other internal improvements, but I feel that a class of people whose property is taxed every year for more than $50,000,000, the rural population of this country, the farmers—taxed over $50,000,000 each year—that it is high time we paid some attention to them. [Applause.] I think it is time we built a few roads in this country to benefit them. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman about that, and that is one reason I am in favor of public buildings in the smaller towns, to which, as I inferred from the gentleman's statement, he is opposed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I want to finish up what I am saying, and then if I have any time I shall be glad to yield.

Now, we know that the cost of transportation is an important matter to everybody, to the people who dwell in cities as well as in the country, and they claim that about 40 per cent of the cost of every article to the consumer is the cost of transportation. Now, we have improved our waterways so that to-day we can carry a ton of freight 1,000 miles for $1.25, we can carry a ton of freight in the United States over our railroads for something like 250 miles for $1.25, but we can not carry a ton of freight on our wagon roads in the United States to exceed 5 miles for $1.25. Now, if we hope to lessen the cost of transportation the wagon road is the place to lessen it. We pay to-day in the United States to carry a ton of freight over our rural highways over twice what it costs in any country in the world, and anyone who has thought upon this subject at all knows that our rural highways to-day are wholly inadequate to meet the demands of the traffic that passes over them. I have in my State rivers that have been improved, in my own district, where hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended on those rivers to improve them, and there does not as much traffic go over those rivers in a year as goes over the rural highways that run parallel to those rivers in a week. If you can justify that proposition I would like to have it justified. I believe that it is going to benefit the people of the East in all the States that really opposed this bill in the last session, particularly east of the Allegheny Mountains. Those great States are dependent, somewhat at least, upon the prosperity of the great rural population, the great farming population of this country. They are as anxious about the crop of wheat or cotton or any other crop as the people of the West or the people of the South or any other agricultural community. They have had money for internal improvements. The great Panama Canal, that cost over $400,000,000, undoubtedly benefited them more directly than it did the great interior or agricultural population of this country, but we have not hesitated in paying this. We are willing even to support, and have for 50 years, the highest kind of a protective tariff on the goods we manufacture, but at this time, after going along for 50 or 100 years, not having any improvements, we say that in making this appropriation for wagon roads it is not asking too much, even if they do not get as much money back as they have to pay out. I want to say I do not concede that the money that comes into the ports of entry of these Eastern States, or any State having a seaport, belongs to them. [Applause.] It belongs to this whole country, and the prosperity of the East or the West depends upon the prosperity of every State in the Union.

The State which I have the honor to represent is one of the agricultural States. Every year for the last few years the value of dairy products alone reached over $100,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he can tell the committee under what process of reasoning the Committee on Roads reached the conclusion that incorporated cities of 2,000 population should have their streets constructed at the expense of the United States Government while all cities above that population are to be excluded from that provision?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. The bill provides that in large villages and cities where the houses are 200 feet apart, and they are on a road that the Secretary of Agriculture believes is a part of a road system, some aid can be placed upon them, but all of this amount is safeguarded by the Secretary of Agriculture. You can not get a cent for any road unless he O. K.'s it and says that it is a road that ought to have Federal aid. He is not going to do foolish things. We have to place in every public official certain discretion and he exercises his sound judgment upon it, and we get very good service from our Federal departments.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman to answer this question.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I would not like to be interrupted on that question further. If the gentleman has another question, I will yield.

The gentleman comes from a large city and represents a large city population, but even in the large cities the road associations favor bills of this kind. There is not a State highway department or State aid in any of the States that applies to the large cities. Some of them give aid to cities as high as 2,000 inhabitants and no higher. Why? Because in cities of that kind they are part of a system of roads and they do not want this road fund to get into the large centers, because it would be swallowed up in the extensive improvements on the city streets and would be lost.

This bill is primarily——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I decline to yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I will yield to my colleague, the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I wanted to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the fact that the question asked by the gentleman from Illinois refers to that provision as to the towns having a population exceeding 2,000, and that provision was included in the bill for the specific purpose of including in the participation of this fund those cities in New England where the incorporated limits of a town cover many square miles. The purpose of the committee was not to exclude from participation under this bill that section of New England that is included within the incorporated limits of cities, but where the homes are more than 200 or 300 feet apart.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. The gentleman from South Carolina is entirely correct.

Mr. MADDEN. That would require the Secretary of Agriculture to have inspectors in every town of the United States to find out every year how close the houses are together.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. The State will take care of those things themselves. Every State highway commission that apportions these funds gives them to the rural communities. This road bill is primarily for the benefit of the rural highways and not for the city streets in the big cities.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman concede——

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I refuse to yield any further.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I refuse to yield to interruptions.

Mr. MADDEN. This is not an interruption. I am just asking a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I refuse to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I am asking this question in perfect good faith.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor, and the Chair hopes there will be no interruption.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. All the State laws have apportioned the road funds to the rural highways and not to the large cities. Some of them go far enough to include villages and cities of 2,000 inhabitants, and there is not a single State law in the United States, among all of the States, that goes so far as to appropriate money for city streets. The reason is that it would not be a fair thing in this bill to provide for city streets. As I say, it is primarily for the rural highway. The cities get many forms of Federal aid, many internal improvements. They get their post-office buildings. The city of Chicago has its fine Federal buildings that cost millions and millions of dollars. And now gentlemen from the cities, or some of them, object to giving the rural communities a little money on a very belated and necessary improvement like the improvement of our wagon roads. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those Representatives from a city who do not object to the country getting a fair proportion of all appropriations, and when this bill was up before I voted for it——

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I know you did.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But I would like to ask the gentleman, in view of the statement he made a moment ago, as to how the farmers pay $50,000,000 in taxes to the United States Government?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. They pay their township taxes, and county taxes, and highway taxes, and pay a tremendous tax to your manufacturers. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I respond very promptly by saying that all residents of the city pay an enormous price for the products that come from the gentleman's farm, and the cost of living has gone up very high to consumers in the cities.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. You pay it to your commission merchants, who make as much as the farmer does.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be, and that is a matter for regulation by law. But let the gentleman answer my question as to how it is and where it is that the farmer pays $50,000,000 into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I have not said he paid it directly into the Treasury of the United States. How does the State of Pennsylvania pay the amount of money to this Federal road fund?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The State of Pennsylvania has, up to date, paid for its own roads, and so have the New England States.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I asked you the question, Has the State of Pennsylvania paid one cent directly into the United States Treasury except by way of an income tax or something of that kind?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has paid large sums into the United States Treasury in internal taxes and because of the improvement of rivers and harbors it is enabled to collect, and does collect, many millions in the form of customs duties.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Through our good roads we are going to benefit you in Pennsylvania the same as you benefit us. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I admit there may be a mutual benefit. We are interdependent, but my question referred to the farmers' payment of $50,000,000 to the Federal Government.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I did not make any such statement. I said we paid taxes on $50,000,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The farmer pays taxes in my State and in the gentleman's State, but not for Federal purposes. He pays taxes only for local purposes.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. If the gentleman has supported the bill in the last Congress, he should do so in this Congress, and he will support this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I rose only to request the gentleman to be fair toward the various sections of the country, and not to attack those parts of the country through which the revenues of the country are collected—as to customs duties, one-third of the whole.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I am not attacking them. I am simply saying we ought to halt in these other internal improvements until we have made a very necessary and belated improvement in our roads. All the people of the United States have been contributing to the internal improvements, such as rivers and harbors and other works, for a hundred years, and the only United States law or Federal law that was ever passed for roads was passed away back in Jefferson's administration, in which we appropriated $7,000,000 for the great Cumberland Road; and that money was as well expended as any $7,000,000 that was ever appropriated by this Government. [Applause.] It opened and started the great western march of the people of this country toward the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman and I agree as to that.

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HELGESEN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he knows the city people pay enormous prices for the products of the farmers. Does he know that the Secretary of Agriculture, after a very careful investigation, reports that the farmer gets only approximately 50 per cent of the price paid by the consumer?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. The gentleman from North Dakota is absolutely correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The fact remains, however, that we pay enormously high prices in the cities for the products of the farmer. You have nothing on us in that respect.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I decline to yield further to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I repeat, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HELGESEN] is entirely right in regard to the farmer getting only 50 per cent of the real selling price paid by the consumer of the product he raises.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will join the gentleman in attempting to remedy that condition as quickly as any other Member of the House.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Well, the Government is trying to work out that problem now, and I hope it is going to be successful. But it is certainly going to lessen the cost to the consumer when it will save an enormous amount of unnecessary cost in hauling products over bad roads. The Secretary of Agriculture says that in the hauling of the annual crop it really is a loss of something like $100,000,000 in marketing the annual crop of from $5,000,000,000 to $10,000,000,000, caused by bad roads, and he says that the highest tax which the American people are paying to-day is the bad road or mud tax.

That is what this bill seeks to remedy. We have got over 2,000,000 miles of roads in the United States, and——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Not now. I can not yield. I say we have over 2,000,000 miles of roads in the United States, and it is an enormous thing to contemplate—the building, in the first instance, the keeping in repair and seeing after the maintenance of all these roads. If the Federal Government appropriates this amount, this is going to act as a great educational factor, as we argued. We have a small Roads Bureau in the United States Government now, but the trouble is that so little money is appropriated for it that it can hardly get out a bulletin or make an investigation. If we appropriate $25,000,000, that will be but a small thing for a State like Pennsylvania. That State will get something like a million and a half dollars from it. It may be a small thing, but it is going to educate the people all over the United States as to road building. It is going to educate every State highway commission. The engineers have not yet figured out and gotten up a road that will stand the wear and tear of modern traffic. We are going to have the best engineers in the country working on that problem. In Pennsylvania, if you want macadam roads at $30,000 a mile, you can have them. If you just want to maintain the roads already built and not build new ones, under this law you can spend the money you receive toward maintaining them. It is a law that is workable in all the 48 States of the Union. You can not make a hard-and-fast rule or specify a kind of road that will be good or a road system that will be workable in all the 48 States, because there are so many different conditions that a road that is good in the interior of Pennsylvania, for example, would bankrupt one of our Western States or agricultural communities.

This bill provides that the moneys shall be apportioned and expended as recommended by the various highway commissions of the States, and it is safeguarded by the Secretary of Agriculture, who stands back there with all the experience and investigation he gets from the engineers and road builders in the different States, and he does not let a dollar go out of the Treasury until he knows that a dollar has been expended by the States, and not only expended, but expended in an intelligent manner. Then only does he let it go. I do not see but that this Government would be amply safeguarded in passing a law of this kind.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is there a provision in this bill that the different States can not participate in this fund unless they contribute a proportionate part?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes. Every State has to pay. When a road proposition is presented by the State highway department to the Secretary of Agriculture, he is the judge of whether the Federal Government pays 30 or 50 per cent of what it can be built for. If it is a high-class road or macadam road, they will get probably 50 per cent. If it is a gravel road or dirt road, it may be 30 per cent. Then the State has got to pay the balance. If the Government gives 50 per cent, the State has got to pay 50 per cent. If the Government pays 30 per cent, the State has got to come forward and pay 70 per cent.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. POWERS. Is it left to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to determine the amount which shall be paid by the Federal Government and the amount which shall be paid by the State?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. It is left to him to determine the per cent, which shall be between 30 and 50 per cent. On an expensive road he will undoubtedly allow a larger per cent than he will on a dirt road or a gravel road; yet in thousands of places in the United States the only road that is practicable and that can be built will be a plain dirt road, well graded and kept up. In some places where they have the material a gravel road will be the kind of road they will build. Right back of all this you have the State highway commission watching over that matter and reporting, and you have the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States and his experts to say what kind of a road shall be built and whether a particular road is one that should have Federal aid or not. I think that the money the Government is called upon to appropriate is safeguarded in every way, and that the Government can be sure that the money appropriated by it is going to be used wisely and economically.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. I would like to ask the gentleman why the committee did not place in this bill a provision appropriating the money so as to vitalize the bill?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Appropriations have to go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Roads Committee is not an appropriating committee. We have not the authority to recommend appropriations.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. The Roads Committee has no authority to make appropriations, and, of course, this bill will have to go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DILLON. But Congress can appropriate the money?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. DILLON. Then why does not it do that and vitalize this bill?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. If Congress passes this bill, then the question of appropriating the money goes to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DILLON. And that will be the last of it?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Oh, no.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What is the attitude of the Department of Agriculture and its Bureau of Public Roads with reference to this bill? Has it considered this bill, and what is its attitude?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I am informed that the Department of Agriculture favors this bill. I am also informed that the State highway commissioners of the various States, representing the State highway departments, met and got up a tentative bill that is substantially this bill. It may vary in some particulars, but on the whole it is practically this bill, and I know that a number of the highway commissions have written letters expressing their approval of this bill.

Mr. NORTON. If this bill passes, does it impose any obligation on the Committee on Appropriations to report, in the sundry civil appropriation bill, an appropriation of $25,000,000 a year, or any amount?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Of course the Committee on Appropriations has got to act on this just the same as on other bills. As the gentleman well knows, the Roads Committee has no power to appropriate any money. The Roads Committee passed on this bill, and if it is the sense of this Congress that this bill should pass, I think there are enough Members who will favor it so that undoubtedly the Committee on Appropriations would recommend the appropriation.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SANFORD. Am I to understand from the reading of this bill that there is any provision here that will require the several States before receiving Federal aid to spend any amount of money whatever in the constuction of roads? That is, if the members of a community get together and do their share of the work—by convict labor, or by local labor, or in any other manner, if they produce the desired result—do they not become entitled to Federal aid when a certain portion of the road is finished, regardless of whether they have spent any money or not?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. They have got to present to the Secretary of Agriculture their system of roads.

Mr. SANFORD. They can do it in any way they want to, can they not?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. They must present their plans and specifications. Then, if they accept the terms imposed by the Secretary of Agriculture, they can go back and build their road, and the Secretary of Agriculture does not care how they build it. If they present to him a good road according to plans and specifications and show that it cost so much money, then he turns over to them the amount that the Government has promised. But if they spend more money upon that road than it ought to cost they do not get anything for the excess of cost. They get exactly what that road can be built for if it is built in the most economical way.

Mr. SANFORD. The point I am making is that a State or a community can build their road without spending one dollar, doing it by convict labor, for instance, or local labor.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. If they build it by convict labor, that represents so much labor or so much money. If I am riding over a road down in Kentucky, if it is a good road I, as a citizen of the United States, do not care how it has been built, and if the State has put in a dollar's worth of work, and the Government of the United States has put in a dollar, and we have two dollars' worth of road, that is all I care about.

Mr. SANFORD. If we spend $25,000,000 through the Federal Government, we will give employment to that much labor, as a reward for the local labor of the various communities. Does not that seem reasonable?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. They simply hire that work to be done. The convict system of labor is employed in only a few of the States of the Union to work on the roads. We would rather have convicts work on the roads than to have them work in competition with free labor in other directions.

Mr. SANFORD. I do not mean convict labor particularly. I mean that so long as the work is done by the State, the Government does not care how it is done.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. If they hire local labor and pay for it, they will have to spend that much money to do the work, and I should not think it would make any difference to the gentleman from New York whether the State as a unit appropriated the money or whether the different localities appropriated the money. We want a law that will be workable in all the States of the Union. [Applause.]

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I find myself in somewhat a lonely minority on my committee in opposing this measure, because I believe it is an unwise policy for the Federal Government to undertake. After reading the speeches in the debates in the last Congress and listening to statements made by the honorable chairman of the committee and my associate who has just concluded, members of the Roads Committee, I am convinced that the only thing the Federal-aid road bill will not accomplish is the cure of measles and the eradication of the seven-year locusts. [Laughter.]

You would think to hear the statements made by gentlemen on the floor of this Chamber at the last session that if you can get Federal aid for highways all the evils in many communities of our several States are to be wiped out. I say that it is an unwise policy for this Government to undertake this thing at this particular time.

The chairman of the committee said that good roads have become a burning question in many of the Western States. Ah, yes, Mr. Chairman, a burning question, but not so burning that they are willing to appropriate their own money to build their roads and maintain their highways. He says there is a great public demand for this measure. Of course, Mr. Chairman, there is always a great public demand whenever there is an opportunity for communities or States to reach into the Federal Treasury and extract funds therefrom.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to inquire whether there is a road in the United States except the Cumberland highway that was not constructed by the farmers and the ordinary laborers and the people in the States without Federal aid?

Mr. WALSH. That is true, Mr. Chairman, but I say that these many States throughout this country can well afford to build their own roads, that it is no part of the Federal Government's duty or obligation to construct highways in whole or in part for the States. One of the bad features of this bill is that the very States that have expended millions of dollars in the construction of their own highways will be called upon to contribute heavily for the construction of roads in other sections of the country. Take the States of Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, New York, Massachusetts, yes Kansas and California, where they have modern highways, and you will find that in computing the proportion of direct taxes—and it will be by direct taxes that this appropriation will be made up—they pay a large proportion of the amount.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman says that the money that will go to pay these expenses will be raised by direct taxation. What does the gentleman mean; how does he mean to differentiate these taxes?

Mr. WALSH. I mean that the revenue of this country secured under the present tariff law is insufficient to carry on the functions of the various departments of this Government, and this administration has been forced to levy a war tax to help pay the expenses of the Government. If you add $25,000,000 more to the expenses of the Government, necessarily it must come out of the direct taxes which have been levied.

Mr. BLACK. But how does the gentleman know that this particular fund will come out of the direct taxes?

Mr. WALSH. What difference does it make, Mr. Chairman, whether it comes out directly or indirectly, you will levy the tax and the people will have to pay it. I point out to the gentleman in this connection that of the $52,000,000 secured by these special taxes during the year ending June 30, 1915, Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania paid $31,140,000.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for another question? Does the gentleman think that ought to be the criterion for public expenses—what a single State pays into the Treasury?

Mr. WALSH. I think when you are embarking on a policy entirely new, a plan entirely novel, to take up a matter which has heretofore been handled by the States independently of the Federal Government, that that certainly should be taken into account, and the further fact that the several States have expended millions of dollars improving their highways also should be taken into account when other States which have expended comparatively small sums for this purpose are asking for a contribution for internal improvements, such as is contemplated by this proposed measure.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. KELLEY. Does not the gentleman think the subject of transportation, whether on the railroads or on the rivers or on the highways, ought to be treated as a whole? In other words, practically all of the merchandise that is hauled over the railroads must be hauled over the highways, and if it is proper to assist in building railroads to a large extent all over the country as we have in times past, why is it not proper to assist in the development of highways which lead up to the stations? [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. In answer to that, I do not think it is proper, because there is no analogy between the two situations.

Mr. KELLEY. Why not? It seems to me that there is. Will the gentleman state in what particular the analogy fails.

Mr. WALSH. In this particular, because this bill is not confined to any particular road used in interstate commerce or in roads running from railroads to any particular point. Any little cow path or lane or alley, in so far as it may be outside the limits of any city, incorporated village or town, can receive Federal aid under this bill. It is not to be directed to thoroughfares from one State into another, but any little road, if it starts nowhere and goes elsewhere, can receive aid.

Mr. KELLEY. To make my question clear, if it is proper for the Federal Government to assist in building a road to carry produce over a road from city to city, why is it not proper for the Federal Government to assist in constructing a road from the farm to the station?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have not as yet admitted that it is proper for the Federal Government to construct a road from the farm to the city or from the city to the farm, nor to aid in the construction of railroads in the States.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman think that if the appropriation is once made out of the Federal Treasury for the construction of highways it will absolutely paralyze all local movement, and that no community will ever thereafter be willing to do anything for itself.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, that is one of the thoughts which I had in mind when I undertook here in my place to defend my position in submitting this report. I intended to express that thought, but I have been diverted by these many interruptions.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if I may answer the question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN]?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The answer is found on page 3 of the bill in the provision that when the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that the construction of a road has been finished he shall then pay the Government contribution, so that the State can not get any of the Government money until after it has complied with that provision and paid out the State money.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied the gentleman from Massachusetts can answer that question.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I feel that I must decline to yield at the present time. I would like to get along with my remarks. Possibly later when the opportunity offers I will be glad to withstand the bombardment of questions from these gentlemen who are so anxious and willing to admit that their own States have failed miserably in the duty which was laid upon them when their States were formed, to construct their own highways, as many States have done.

Take the great State of New York, for example. That State has expended millions and millions of dollars in constructing a modern system of highways, and would contribute several millions of dollars toward this appropriation, but it would receive back from its own contribution only a small amount, a little over $1,000,000, as its allotment under this bill, and yet it is contended that this distribution is equitable. Mr. Chairman, I believe the reason why the arbitrary amount of $65,000 was fixed in the bill is simply as the darky would say, to take the "cuss" off the whole proposition; and if it were not for that $65,000, Delaware would receive only $38,000, under the bill as drawn; Nevada, $36,000; Rhode Island, $74,000; Utah, $73,000; Wyoming, $60,000; Arizona, $52,000; Idaho, $105,000; and Vermont, $122,000.

Let me call your attention to the definition of what a rural post roads is, as contained in this bill. It is stated that the term "rural post roads"— shall be held to mean any public road over which rural mail is, or might be, carried—

Mr. Chairman, I ask some one to point out a single highway in the whole Union that can not be considered a rural post road under that definition, because the mail might be carried over it at some time. The bill continues:

Outside of incorporated cities, towns, and boroughs having a population exceeding 2,000, and in such cities, towns, and boroughs having a population exceeding 2,000 along streets and roads where the houses average more than 200 feet apart.

Mr. Chairman, they actually seek in this bill to set that up as a definition of a rural post road, which is to cover the appropriation of Federal funds in the construction of highways throughout these United States. I say it is defective, and the committee could very well have said that they will appropriate money simply for the aid of highways in the several States of the Union. Another feature of this measure which I submit is vicious in its import is that the Congress of the United States says to the several States of the Union: You have got to have a certain department in running your own affairs; you must necessarily have a highway commission within your borders, irrespective of whether the people of your State desire a highway commission or a highway department; if you want Federal aid you have got to establish one, and it has got to be called presumably by that name and under that designation.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, another defect in the bill is that once having appropriated money, and that money having been expended, the Government has no further supervision over the highways. The Government gives the State this money, and after the road is constructed and the money is paid the Government retains no jurisdiction or control over the highway, and that highway the very next year, for all that Congress knows, may be discontinued or abandoned or used in some other way or for some other purpose, so that the money that the Congress has appropriated and expended for this purpose will have become wasted.

If this is a wise policy to adopt, there should have been some provision for the control or supervision in the future. In my opinion, appropriating the money to aid in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads is a shallow pretext, because the concluding section of the bill makes it clear that it is done simply to aid the farmers of the country; and, in so far as that is true, this is class legislation. I am not criticizing the farmers of the country, because we have farmers in the New England States—in "effete" New England, as it was termed here the other day—and the farmers in the New England States have been in the past and will be in the future ready and willing to assume and bear their burdens by way of increased taxes and build their own roads from their farms to the railroad stations or from their farms to the post offices—and under this bill no allowance is made for what they have done in this direction heretofore—but to seek to appropriate money on the pretext that you are doing it to aid rural free delivery or to improve rural post roads, in view of the words in the next to the last section of the bill, shows conclusively that it is not done to aid in the delivery of the United States mails or to build up a great system of highways for the great Postal Service of the country, but is done to relieve a certain class of our population in certain sections of our vast country of burdens which in other sections of the country have been patiently, if not cheerfully, borne by individuals of the same class. And I say it is to the glory and credit of the New England farmer, and the farmers of other States where large sums of money have been expended, that they have borne this burden in the shape of taxation, and have, in addition, contributed their just share of taxation for other improvements, local, State, and national, without a whimper. The Massachusetts farmers, in common with the farmers of other New England States and the farmers of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, New Jersey, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, and California are no weaklings, Mr. Chairman, and they are reaping the benefits of expenditures to which they have contributed without a thought of a partnership between their State and the Federal Government.

But if it is done to relieve the farmer of the burdens which they ought to be willing to bear, if there is this great demand, and if it is going to lift these great burdens from the farmers, and it is going to result in this tremendous financial benefit to them, why should they not be willing in the States of the West or the States of the South or the States or any other section of the country to bear the burden of increased taxation and have the roads built under State supervision? The advocates of this measure talk about the State appropriating half the money. Why, Mr. Chairman, if they are willing to appropriate half the money, if the Government should put in half, why are not these States willing to appropriate their half at once or in the near future without Federal aid and show to the country at large that they have made an honest effort, a conscientious endeavor, to remedy a defect which has existed owing to the lack of a modern system of highways in their respective communities? We have proceeded in this country heretofore, as I before stated, with the building of roads as a matter of State duty and State jurisdiction, and we would be as well justified in appropriating money here in this Congress to build schoolhouses or town halls and to take care of the paupers of the many States of this Union as we would be to step in and appropriate money to build these roads. If this is to become a law, I submit that if those States are sincere in their effort to have improved highways there should be some provision inserted in this bill whereby the States which receive this money shall repay at least a part of it back to the Federal Treasury.

I have pointed out in my minority views printed to accompany the report on this bill, Mr. Chairman, some of the inconsistencies and discrepancies which occur in the apportionment of the money under the provisions of this bill, and I want to call attention to the fact that, although this bill is supposed to improve roads in rural communities, no allowance is made in computing the population. No allowance is made for the population in the great cities of these various States. They are all included in the total of population and in the ratio which the population of that State bears to the population of the entire country. But if this is to aid the rural communities, the population should be apportioned upon the ratio which the rural population bears to the population of the entire country, so that this money will go to those communities where the need may be expressed as great. For instance, Colorado, with a popution of nearly 800,000, is allowed $252,000; Oregon, with 672,000 population, gets $248,000; North and South Dakota, with a population combined of less than 600,000, get $335,000 and $337,000, respectively——

Mr. DILLON. That is not right.

Mr. WALSH. While Connecticut, with over 1,000,000 of population, is allowed but $258,000. The mileage comparison is the same and the same discrepancies occur; and in the star-route mileage, as set forth in this bill here, in the table accompanying the report, the same discrepancies occur. Rhode Island, with 87.61 miles of star routes, gets $139,000. Wyoming, with 4,137 miles of star-route highways, only gets $125,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, at least some effort should be made in appropriating Federal money to see that it goes to States which at least try to improve their own system of highways. In 1913 the State of Alabama, as a State, for State highways, spent $127,000, and under this allotment here she would be allowed to receive $579,000. Delaware spent $30,000, and is allotted under this bill $103,000. California spent $2,000,000 and over in 1913, and yet she gets but $504,000. Connecticut spent $3,483,000, and she gets but $258,000. Florida and Georgia spent not a cent, as States, for highways in 1913, and yet get $202,000 for Florida and $722,000 for Georgia.

The following States made no expenditures for State highway funds in 1913: Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, Nevada, North Dakota, South Dakota, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas. The total amount of State expenditures for highways in 1913, Mr. Chairman, in the United States only amounted to $37,437,000, and of this amount the States of California, Connecticut, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, and even Washington, in the far Northwest, contributed of that $37,000,000 the sum of $30,000,000. So you can see the many States that have neglected the road problem. Of course they can say that there has been a great increase in highway commissions and highway departments in some of these Western States, but it is interesting to notice that this increase in these highway commissions has been coincident with the introduction of Federal-aid road bills in the Congress of the United States. I say it is because these highway commissions have sought to expend or to assist in the expenditure of Federal aid.

Now, Mr. Chairman, something has been said about the Government having the constitutional authority to expend money for post offices and post roads. That may or may not be true. There may or may not be some doubt upon that question, but irrespective of that, whenever the United States Government undertakes to expend money for improvements they see to it that in expending that money that it is wisely and judiciously expended; and furthermore, they exercise, after the expenditure is made, some degree of control, and that is not the case with this law.

They say that because the United States uses these highways and byways in carrying the rural mail to the patrons of the country post offices that they should therefore aid to the extent of one-half of the expense in constructing and repairing those roads. I say, sir, that if this bill and its purpose is to be based upon the theory that because the Government uses the highways it should therefore contribute to the maintenance and constructing of them, that then the Government should only contribute its fair share toward maintaining and constructing these highways, taking into account all the uses to which the highways are put; and if that were the theory upon which this legislation were to stand you would find, instead of paying from 30 to 50 per cent of the cost, that this Government would only pay from 1 to 10 per cent of the cost, and no such large sum would be required to be appropriated.

I say, sir, that to enact this legislation will discourage rather than encourage road building under State auspices, because once you get Federal expenditure or Federal appropriation or Federal participation in carrying out any of the great functions of the Government the growth and tendency of the times have been to discourage doing or performing that function under State auspices and to gradually and slowly turn that power, authority, or duty over to Federal supervision and control. And I say that under this bill that will inevitably follow. There may not be men here who will see it, but there will come a time if we launch the Government upon this program when the States will take the stand that if their highways become run down and out of repair that because the United States Government at one time expended money for the construction or maintenance of those roads they will not do anything more for them until the United States Government comes to their rescue.

I say, sir, that this legislation is not wise, and I want to call the attention of the gentlemen on this side of the House especially to the fact that this is one of the measures which for several years has been in the platform of the Democratic Party, while the Republican Party has never incorporated a plank for Federal aid, but has simply asserted its belief in good roads and recommended the improvement of them to the several States of the Union. And I am not surprised at the frantic endeavors of the Democracy to fulfill their platform promise in this respect, because it is in striking contrast with their efforts in the past to put into practice their promises upon one or two other doctrines laid down in that immortal document, and I might refer perhaps to the one-term plank as to the presidential term of office.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I say, sir, that it is well for this Congress at this time to stop and consider whether, in view of the many important questions that are pressing for consideration, whether in view of the present condition of the Federal Treasury as it has been enunciated upon both sides of this Chamber, this country is in a condition to launch out upon an entirely new policy involving an expenditure of $25,000,000. But if it is well to set forth upon this unknown sea, I submit it would be much better for this House to reduce that appropriation materially—down to less than $5,000,000—and see what will happen with that kind of an appropriation and the consequent apportionment that could be made thereunder. But I object, because I honestly and sincerely believe that this is not a policy for which we as Members of this great body ought to stand under the present conditions in this country, and in view of the fact that the sole demand, as it were, seems to come from States which in the past have been unwilling to aid themselves and now see a chance to have Federal aid from the United States Treasury. [Applause.]

I desire to submit the following comparative tables and invite the attention of the proponents of the measure to them:

Comparisons.

MILEAGE COMPARISONS.

Louisiana, with 0.75 per cent of combined routes, gets	$345,064
West Virginia, with 1.19 per cent of combined routes, gets	340,688
Montana, with 0.76 per cent of combined routes, gets	192,998

RURAL FREE DELIVERY MILEAGE.

Alabama, 25,845 miles rural free delivery routes, gets	579,180
Kentucky, 18,765 miles rural free delivery routes, gets	580,274
New Jersey, 7,149 miles rural free delivery routes, gets	438,054
Vermont, 7,610 miles rural free delivery routes, gets	187,528

STAR-ROUTE MILEAGE.

Illinois, 717.77 miles, gets	1,372,330
Montana, 6,541 miles, gets	792,998
Rhode Island, 87.61 miles, gets	139,392
Wyoming, 4,137.03 miles, gets	125,170
Connecticut, 4,724 miles, gets	253,168
Delaware, 359.06 miles, gets	258,638

Yet Pennsylvania, with 8.36 per cent of population and 4.48 per cent of rural free delivery and star routes, and receiving $1,469,696, is given $65,000, the same as the smaller States; also New York, with 9,113,614 population, 9.94 per cent, and 4.04 per cent of combined routes, receiving $1,372,330, receives $65,000, the same as Nevada and other small States.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SAUNDERS, Mr. BORLAND, and Mr. HELGESEN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from North Dakota rise?

Mr. HELGESEN. The gentleman from Massachusetts said that he would answer questions if he had time, and he now has the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has yielded the floor.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL]. [Applause.]

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts, my Republican colleague on the Roads Committee, who lives in a great city and, of course, opposes our bill, is careless when he refers to our rural mail routes as "cow trails." If he will go to the real rural sections of the South and call our cherished rural routes "cow trails," his next trip will be up a telephone pole. His speech of an hour makes it clear that no further argument is needed to convince the majority of this House that this road legislation is equitable, beneficial, and desirable at this time.

There is no conflict between the city and the country as the gentleman from Massachusetts has discussed for an hour. Whatever helps the one upbuilds the other. The city and the country are the thoroughbreds of the future, who are to go hand in hand down the ages in patriotic service to our common country. [Applause.] All thinking men know that prosperity to the country brings wealth and success to the city. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in no other way can our Government add so rapidly to the prosperity of the Nation than by contributing to road building, thus saving millions in transportation and making our sparsely settled sections so desirable that the inhabitants will not wish to leave them. If it is wise and beneficial for the State to raise a general fund, as does the State of Louisiana, out of which a portion of the cost of constructing our roads is to be paid, it would seem equally just and equitable for the Federal Government to contribute a portion toward the cost of constructing highways in each and every State. It is a fundamental principle of democratic government that for the common good and in their own interest the strong sections shall contribute their just part in upbuilding the weak. It is a fact that nearly all large appropriations made by the Federal Government in the past have been expended in and near great cities, while but little, and generally nothing, has been expended in our rural sections. The time has come to right this wrong. In the past for their taxes our farmers have received from the Federal Government a few garden seed, a limited number of rural mail routes, and an occasional promise, not yet fulfilled by the Government. This bill, providing that the Federal Government shall pay not less than 30 per cent nor more than 50 per cent of road construction and road maintenance, is the first direct proposition to give the farmers of the country a square deal. [Applause.]

Roads are local concerns, and primarily it is the duty of the States to provide them for their people. On the other hand, it should be noted that no system of permanent highways was ever built or maintained in any country without the substantial aid of the general government of that country.

To carry and deliver the mail is a function of the Federal Government, and it is its duty to provide itself with the facilities necessary to a proper performance of this function, such as postmasters, post offices, and post roads. A post road is just as truly a postal facility as is a post office. As in most rural communities, it has been found less expensive and more expedient to rent post offices than to build them, so it would be less expensive and more expedient to use the roads of the States as post roads than it would to construct and maintain an independent system. In such case it would seem but just that the General Government should make some contribution to the construction and maintenance of the roads which it thus uses.

In times past when the volume and weight of postal matter were negligible the interest of the General Government in the conditions of the roads was not substantial, but with the advent of rural free delivery came a Federal necessity for better roads, and with the now rapidly expanding parcel post that necessity has become acute. The demand upon the Federal Government as expressed by this bill is immediate and imperative, not only for the performance of its functions in the mail service, but to prepare a virile and aggressive citizenship upon which the Government must depend for prosperity and supremacy.

Our great rural population produces the wealth that makes our cities great and perpetuates the power of the Federal Government. They bear the burden of the Government in times of peace, and in times of war the country boy and the boy from the smaller town fearlessly follow the flag where "thickest falls the red rain of human slaughter." He receives little of the blessings of Government beyond the post office and the rural carrier, but in times of need he forgets all this and gives himself freely, if need be, in the cause of his country. [Applause.] This bill is for him. You are for him. The Nation should be for him, for the Government depends upon him. The speedy passage of this bill is but a feeble expression of the gratitude due him. Then, surely, road building and road maintenance by the Federal Government in cooperation with the States is just, equitable, and beneficial, not only as an economic and social necessity but as one of the highest forms of preparedness that will bring needed wealth to the Government in its hours of possible distress. Germany began her marvelous plan of preparedness by building permanent roads and factories and establishing farm credits and scientific agriculture, thus making her citizens efficient and sufficient as a national asset. [Applause.]

Unless we provide for internal improvements as a basis of our national prosperity, upon what shall the additional taxes be levied to meet the emergency for a proposed larger Army and Navy? A nation impoverished within can not be a world power. In this emergency, I for one shall insist that the increased revenue for the Army and Navy come from a Federal inheritance tax and a larger income tax, so that the usual revenues of the Government may be expended upon our needed internal improvements. [Applause.]

We are to be called upon to expend extra millions for the Army and Navy in preparedness. When is a nation prepared? That nation is best prepared when it equips itself within for stalwart growth, prosperity, and power. Internal stagnation means national weakness. It is understood that preparedness means an adequate Army and Navy, with ample coast defense and an efficient merchant marine, but it also means good roads, good schools, rural mail routes, improved waterways and drainage, scientific agriculture, rural credits, and adequate public buildings for the conduct of the public business. All the people, regardless of class or position, have the same right to enjoy these blessings. My conception of preparedness includes these internal activities to give meaning and force to our national life. As we grow strong within we become more truly the leading world power.

This good-roads bill, directing the Department of Agriculture to expend $25,000,000 annually in road building and road maintenance, in cooperation with the State highway departments, deals with one of the important factors in national preparedness. The General Government has constitutional power to construct and maintain post roads, military roads, and roads used in the transportation of interstate commerce. On the general principle that the greater contains the lesser, it follows that the General Government should aid the States in the construction and maintenance of such roads.

As a member of the House Committee on Roads, which committee has studied this subject and worked faithfully upon it for three years, I appeal to you, my colleagues, to pass the bill now by such an overwhelming majority that the Senate of the United States, where a similar bill died in the Sixty-third Congress, may respond to the sentiment of the country and pass the bill without delay, so that it may become effective in this year 1916. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] says that the purpose of this bill is to aid the farmers. Well, even if that were the sole purpose of this measure, it would not be an ignoble, or unworthy one. I know of no class of our people who are more deserving of aid than the farmers of the country, or who have received less at the hands of Congress in the way of special legislation. [Applause.] Some gentlemen seem to think that all of our appropriations should be confined to the big cities. In their view it is entirely proper to construct magnificent public buildings in those cities, and expend gigantic sums from the public revenues in dredging deeper the harbors of our port towns. This, in their judgment, is wise legislation and profound statesmanship. But as soon as some Member from a country district seeks to advance rural conditions, and spend a little money for the improvement of the country roads, these same gentlemen oppose such a bill with great vehemence, insisting that it is unconstitutional, and impolitic. A proposition to expend a thousand millions of dollars on a needless increase in our military establishment is hailed with delight, while a bill to expend a meager twenty-five millions on farmers' roads is denounced as a pork barrel. Well the fellows that have been enjoying the fat sides, and plump hams of the past, ought not to begrudge the farmers a few spareribs, and backbones. The Congress has expended many millions upon projects far less meritorious than the great cause of better roads for the farmers. It has expended since 1878, over $650,000,000 on rivers, and harbors. It has expended over $400,000,000 on the Panama Canal, and the end is not yet in sight. We donated over 197,000,000 acres of splendid land in the West toward the building of the transcontinental railways.

The farmers have been very patient. "They pay a very large part of the revenues of the Government that go into the Federal Treasury, a larger part in proportion to their wealth than any other class of our citizens. They have received in return from the Federal Government in the way of appropriations for their benefit, less than any other class. Uncomplainingly, year after year, and decade after decade, they have seen their millions go by the way of Federal appropriations, to the aid of rivers and harbors, for the erection of great and imposing buildings in the cities, for elaborate and expensive coast defenses, for the citizens on the seaboard, and for a thousand other purposes." To crown it all, the men who are advocating a billion-dollar military program, begrudge them this pittance.

Permit me on the part of the committee to reply briefly to one or two of the criticisms that our friend from Massachusetts has directed against this bill. One of them is his objection to our definition of a rural post road. For that definition we rely upon the following provision of the Revised Statutes:

> All public roads and highways while kept up, and maintained as such, are hereby declared to be post roads.

If this citation does not furnish ample authority for the definition used in our bill, then I am unable to draw a correct conclusion, or fairly interpret a comparatively simple statute.

One other objection urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts was that in making the apportionment between the States, we took into account the population of the cities. I admit that our scheme of apportionment is purely arbitrary, but I insist that no other scheme than an arbitrary one can be adopted. However, did the gentleman who complains that we have taken into consideration the urban population in the several States, have in mind that the very purpose we had in view in including this population, was to be fair to States like Massachusetts, and New York, with their great cities of Boston, and New York. So with respect to the great urban populations in other States, they too with a view to being fair, were included for the purposes of apportionment. The rest of us would be more than willing to have the gross appropriation divided between the States upon a basis which would eliminate the population of the great cities. Such a scheme of division would be greatly to our advantage. Yet our friend is complaining of a provision that was inserted for his benefit, and for the benefit of other States similarly situated. This illustrates the unreasonable character of his opposition to the pending bill.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to occupy the time of the House this evening with an argument in favor of good roads designed to present in detail the benefits that will inevitably flow from a universal system of improved highways. I take it for granted that in this age of the world's civilization there is no need to advance such a contention. A universal consensus of judgment in favor of improved highways may be taken for granted. It was an unfair criticism on the part of the gentleman from Massachusetts to intimate that the friends of this measure present it as a cure for all the ills of the body politic. We do nothing of the sort. We make no such claim in its behalf. We believe that this measure is a well digested, well worked out, and rational plan to mobilize a portion of the resources of the entire country in aid of domestic development. Further, we expect to satisfy the most exacting critic of this measure that the interests of the Federal Treasury are adequately safeguarded, and that every precaution has been taken to guarantee that the Federal contribution in aid of road construction, will be wisely, economically, and judiciously expended. As guardians of the Federal Treasury we should surround the expenditure of Federal money with appropriate protective provisions. This we have done. The gentleman from Massachusetts belongs to the school of thought that in its day objected to river and harbor development, on the ground that there was no warrant of Federal authority for such work. This objection has long since been abandoned, and if the gentleman was not such a belated representative of an ancient school of strict constructionists, he would know that in this House at least, the time has passed when it is necessary for an advocate of a measure of this character to present arguments for his contention that there is full warrant of constitutional authority for Federal appropriations in aid of the construction, improvement, and maintenance of post roads. [Applause.] The authority to enact this legislation is so fully afforded by the Constitution, that it is no longer open to question, or challenge. But two needful things remain for us to establish on behalf of this measure, and they are, First: Would a universal system of road development in the United States be helpful to the general interests of the entire country? On this proposition, as I have said, we are all agreed. Second: Having in mind the results intended to be secured, is this a bill that will efficiently secure those results? Our bill will be justly criticized, if it is open to the charge that it is so loosely, or carelessly drawn, that the money proposed to be appropriated, may be wastefully, or extravagantly expended. Such however is not the case.

The Members of this body who were here two years ago, and voted for the bill of that session, will recognize that this bill is in large measure along the same lines. It contains the same general principle of Federal aid, but I think I may say to those who voted for the former measure, that the present bill is a better phrased and better balanced bill than its predecessor, and one that will more thoroughly meet the objections of the gentlemen who opposed that bill on the ground that the interests of the General Government were not sufficiently protected. I desire to point out to you that if we have erred in any respect in this measure, it has been along the line of giving too much authority to a Federal department. Still, I do not apprehend that this power will be abused.

We have not included in the present bill that portion of the former bill which divided the roads into classes, and provided a fixed amount to be paid on the roads in each class, contingent on the maintenance by the States of those roads to the standards prescribed. That section was most vehemently assailed in the last session of Congress, and we have eliminated it entirely, without admitting however that these objections were well taken. At any rate we have removed a stumbling block, and rock of offense to a portion at least of our membership.

It was also urged by gentlemen in opposition in the last House, that it was possible for some smaller unit than the State to take up with the Federal department a project of road development, or road maintenance. We have always denied that there was anything in the former bill which in any wise justified this contention, but to meet all objection on this line, we have recast our language in such fashion that this contention is now impossible. It is made absolutely clear that when the Government is approached with respect to a project, either of maintenance, improvement, or construction, it must be approached by the road commission of a State, or its equivalent, as provided by the bill. Since I have been a Member of this body I have seen the full development of popular approval of this principle of Federal aid to roads. Today the great bulk of the States are equipped with road commissions, and these commissions are actively advocating the principle of this bill. Moreover the committee appointed by the National Association of Highway Commissioners, to collaborate and cooperate with your House committee, has given the express stamp of their approval to the pending measure.

I may say further that the Agricultural Department which, on behalf of the Federal Government, will be charged with certain large duties in connection with the execution of this measure, has likewise indorsed the plan of aid reported by your committee, so that this bill comes before you with the favor of the highway commissioners, the favor of the Agricultural Department, and practically the unanimous indorsement of your House committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. For how many years has the Roads Committee considered this question upon testimony and by meetings?

Mr. SAUNDERS. This is the second bill that the Committee on Roads has reported.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. For how many years?

Mr. SAUNDERS. This particular committee was created two years ago. It was established in response to an insistent demand on the part of the country, and of the House, that a committee should be created that could adequately deal with this great subject matter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That committee reported this bill unanimously, with the exception of one member.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; that is my understanding.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. POWERS. I am in sincere sympathy with the purposes of Federal aid to good roads; but I should like to know what there is in the criticism of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that the Federal Government will have no authority or jurisdiction over the roads after the money has been appropriated and expended upon them?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The statement of fact is correct, but the criticism based upon the fact is unfounded. That provision was deliberately inserted in the bill to meet objections that came from all over the country to the effect that if the Federal Government retained jurisdiction over these roads, such retention would introduce perplexing questions of conflicting jurisdiction between the Federal Government, and the States. The committee was overwhelmingly opposed to Federal jurisdiction over the highways proposed to be aided under the provisions of this bill. It is true, as a matter of fact, that the Federal Government will have no jurisdiction over the roads aided, after the money is once expended in that direction. But this provision should be the subject of commendation, not of criticism.

May I go a step further in the discussion of this bill? We invoke the fullest inquiry into its general purpose, and legislative provisions, and I hope to be able to answer satisfactorily the questions of the friends of this measure who may not be clearly advised as to some of its provisions. At the same time I shall endeavor to repel the criticisms of those who oppose it, either in whole, or in part. But while we believe in the general principle presented, we are not wedded to any particular form of language designed to make that principle effective. As I said, if a project of road development is desired to be submitted by a State, that State approaches the Federal Government through its road commission.

In other words, the unit is the State. The representative of that commission presents the project to the Agricultural Department, giving a sufficient outline of the improvement desired to enable the experts of the Agricultural Department to determine in advance whether the proposition is, or is not, meritorious. Then if the department is inclined to think that the proposition thus presented is meritorious, and worthy of aid out of that proportion of the general fund which is segregated for that particular State, it may call upon the State to furnish further information, and such data, estimates, and plans as will enable the experts of the department to determine the cost of construction, and the full merits of the project, in a word to determine in relation to the case submitted everything that the Federal department ought to know before reaching its conclusions.

Having advanced thus far, if the department approves the project as a whole, the State is authorized to proceed with the work. When the work is concluded, and it is ascertained by the Federal department through its appropriate agents, that the work has been done according to the plans approved by its experts, then the department may make payment of the sum which has been decided upon for this particular project of road construction, improvement, or maintenance. Will any gentleman on this floor suggest that up to this point there is anything of authority lacking to the Federal Government to enable it to safeguard the expenditure of its money, or to compel the construction of the improvements contemplated, upon the terms agreed on between the contracting sovereignties?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. There is a provision in the bill which authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to pay money to the States from time to time as the work progresses.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say that the Secretary of Agriculture could not pay the money until the work was completed and approved.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I should have completed my statement by adding that if, in the progress of the work, it was developed that the same was being done in conformity with the prescribed requirements, the department could make such payments as it chose to make, not to exceed 50 per cent of the value of the work already done. But this is a question of discretion in the Government. It is not compellable to make these pro rata payments.

Mr. MADDEN. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a further question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Virginia enlighten the committee on the question of the advisability of clothing the Secretary of Agriculture with the power to say whether 20, 30, 40, or 50 per cent of the cost shall be paid by the Federal Government?

Mr. SAUNDERS. We have fixed those limits—between 30 and 50 per cent.

Mr. MADDEN. Whatever it may be.

Mr. SAUNDERS. We have given him that discretion.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask the gentleman what he thinks of the wisdom of that?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Personally I would prefer to fix a flat amount of 50 per cent, but the flexible provision was put in to meet the objections that might be urged on the ground that for some work 50 per cent of aid would be too much, and for other work under different conditions, 30 per cent would be too little.

Mr. MADDEN. May I ask one more question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman from Virginia believe that with that large discretionary power in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture, sooner or later political influences will be used upon the Secretary of Agriculture to induce him to pay 50 per cent where only 30 per cent ought to be paid, and 30 per cent where 50 per cent should be paid, and that a political scandal will ensue as the result of that?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not a bit of it. The payments in one State do not concern any State in the Union save the one interested. The amount of money that will go to a State is fixed in advance. The exercise of the Secretary's discretion in aiding the roads of a State, will not increase the aggregate of the allowance for that State, or diminish the respective quotas of the other States.

The Secretary need not make these pro rata payments. They are entirely within the discretion of a Federal official. This provision is another illustration of the painstaking care exercised by the committee to safeguard the Federal interests.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In response to the gentleman from Illinois the gentleman from Virginia stated that under the bill the Secretary of Agriculture could make a partial payment. Is it not true, though, that even that partial payment by the Secretary of Agriculture can not be made unless it shall be shown that in no case it exceeds the pro rata part of the United States of the value of labor and materials which have been put upon the road?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Of course. And as I said, the Secretary need not make these pro rata payments. These payments are entirely within the discretion of a Federal official. This provision is another illustration of the painstaking care exercised by the committee to safeguard the Federal interests.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I beg the pardon of the gentleman, but I want to make plain, if I can, a point which I think has been misunderstood. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] unintentionally misinterpreted the clause of the bill which was referred to by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. These partial payments, if any, can "in no case be more than the pro rata part of the United States of the value of labor and materials which have been put into such construction or maintenance"—by the State, of course.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly, and as I insist again, the Federal Government is not even required to make these partial payments.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, I yield.

Mr. ELSTON. I have looked over this bill in rather a rapid way, and I do not find that it would cover an instance of this kind. In California we have carried out these advanced conditions to a remarkable degree. We have raised by a bond issue something like $18,000,000, and spent it in less than four or five years. We have spent it on a program by which the counties were to contribute almost half that amount; so I should say, without the figures before me, that we have spent $40,000,000 on improvements of roads within the last four or five years. The question I want to ask the gentleman is, Does your bill cover a case of this kind where, as I say, California and the counties have expended so much money; that is, will the amount provided in this bill be apportioned to California, and can California let it lie to its credit in the Treasury until such time as they can use it?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, it must be a working capital, so to say. It must be put to work. But I wish to call the gentleman's attention in this connection, because it is one of the most valuable features of our bill, to the fact that it does not interfere with the domestic road policy of any State. Each State can use its pro rata fund in a way to work out its problem according to its own conception, so as to promote the best interests of road development in that State. Of course the road to be constructed must be one of the approved types prescribed by the bill, and the work must be done under the supervision of the State commission, and the Department of Agriculture.

The gentleman advises us that California has completed a large mileage of roads, something very much to the credit of that State, but these roads must be maintained. A State that fails to provide a maintenance fund, does not meet the situation, and the maintenance fund of your State will be very large. California can utilize her pro rata part of the general fund for the maintenance of the roads which she has already completed.

Mr. ELSTON. The gentleman's construction of the bill is that it provides for maintenance?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, it says so expressly. Look at the title.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. Has there been any estimate made as to what increase there will be for the number of employees and overhead charges that would be incurred by the Department of Agriculture in the distribution?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, you can not well make that estimate at this time. No preliminary estimate has been made as yet. The bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall retain in his hands a sum sufficient to provide the necessary expert assistants.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS. I want to know whether or not the Federal Government will contribute any part of this money to the roads that have been already constructed; will this go to the maintenance of roads over which the Federal Government has had no jurisdiction?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Of course. The gentleman will see that by looking to the title of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ROGERS. The bill proposes to expend not exceeding $25,000,000 per year?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Suppose the State should in a given year not expend quite all of that to which it was entitled under the bill; can it save that up on the treasurer's books?

Mr. SAUNDERS. It remains to the credit of the State until it is returned to the Treasury under the covering-in statute. I think that time is two years.

Mr. ROGERS. Then a State could not roll up for a period of five years the amounts due it, and use it for an elaborate system of highways?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia with whom rests the final determination as to the material that enters into the road?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The State submits its plans and propositions to the department at Washington. I said a moment ago that if the bill erred in anything it was in giving too much veto power to the Agricultural Department. The State is entitled under this bill to build any prescribed type of road that it prefers. In one locality it may build a concrete road, in another a macadam road, in another a sand clay road, in still another a dirt road of approved type. The State is compelled to present its proposition to the Federal department. If it satisfies that department that the proposed improvement is meritorious, the work is begun, but if it fails to satisfy the department, that particular project must be dropped.

Mr. KING. The final determination rests with the Federal department at Washington?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, it can put a veto on any proposition that the State submits. I submit that under this bill it will be impossible to expend the money of the Government wastefully and extravagantly, unless the Agricultural Department is corrupt, or inefficient.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Under this bill I understand in the process of the work the Government can make partial payment before the whole of the road is completed.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, a pro rata part of the value of the work completed up to that time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Whether or not the road is completed through a county or township or a subdivision of the State and completed to the satisfaction of the State highway authorities, full payment could be made for that subdivision.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, pro rata payments in the discretion of the department may be made on any work under construction.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I notice that section 1 of the bill undertakes to define what a rural post road shall be. It says for the purposes of this act the term rural post road shall be held to mean any public road over which rural mail is or might be carried outside of incorporated cities, towns, and boroughs, and so forth. It seems to me that is subject to the construction that it could not be placed upon any rural road or post road that does not extend out of a city of that size.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think not.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Should not you change that clause so that it would read to public roads outside of incorporated cities of that size?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I will say just this. The committee is not enamored of any particular phrasing. If the gentleman will prepare his amendment and submit it, and on consideration it appears that the bill is justly amenable to the criticism he makes, there will be no difficulty in having his amendment adopted by the committee.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I understand what the committee intended to express was that rural post roads shall include any road outside of a city of 2,000 inhabitants, and so forth.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. I suggest to the gentleman that he prepare his amendment and submit it. There will be no difficulty about accepting any amendment that improves the bill.

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. HELGESEN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] objected to the bill because, according to his idea, great agricultural States of the West would get a benefit from it over what States in the East would get?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. HELGESEN. Is it not a fact that one of the causes of the high cost of living is the cost of taking the farm products from the farm to the consumer?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is true.

Mr. HELGESEN. Is it not a fact that with good roads the cost of delivering farm products to the market, and to the consumer is reduced from 30 to 75 per cent?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman is undoubtedly correct in his statement.

Mr. HELGESEN. The State of South Dakota, to which he referred as a small unit of less than three-quarters of a million people, undoubtedly hauls 10 times the tonnage that the farmers of the State of Massachusetts do, all of which is food products. If you can reduce the cost of taking those products to the market, it will inure to the benefit of the consumer, of which he is one.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Unquestionably. So far as the criticism of the gentleman from Massachusetts is concerned, I do not think it is a serious one, and answering it in a sort of ad hominem way, I would say that the agricultural States that are without harbors have heretofore been paying their full part of the money that has gone to those States where there are harbors, and where costly harbor improvements have been constructed, as in Massachusetts for instance.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I notice the gentleman said in answer to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] that the State could use those funds in any way it saw fit, so far as expenditure on any road is concerned. In other words, if a State had a system of crossroads or interstate highways, it could use its portion of the fund upon that system.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Absolutely, and upon any one road in that system.

Mr. BORLAND. And, on the contrary, if it had simply rural roads or local post roads, it could use the money for the maintenance of that class of roads?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. And that the initiative came from the State?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, and the veto from the Federal Government.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I am not quite clear in my own mind about this matter. Do I understand that the difference between this money that will be given to these States and the expenditure of Federal funds ordinarily is that after the Government has finally paid the money into this road fund it forever has lost all jurisdiction over the roads through which it goes, while in all other public improvements it maintains some control?

Mr. SAUNDERS. All jurisdiction under this act. If the United States has any jurisdiction otherwise, by virtue of any provision, or section of the Constitution, that jurisdiction is not sought to be interfered with, and could not be interfered with, by this act. But under this act, the Government does not take any jurisdiction as the result of the expenditure of its money under the oversight of the Agricultural Department.

We consider that the Federal Government gets value received for that expenditure in the benefits that will inure to the entire country from this application of a portion of the Federal funds.

Mr. MEEKER. May I ask if this is not the only project of that sort whereby the Government gives its money away and thereafter has no control whatever?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am not prepared to say, but I will admit it, pro arguendo. The statement, if true does not detract at all from the merits of the proposition.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not true that the Government contributes money to the departments of agriculture of the various States and retains no control over those departments?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, yes; all of the land grant colleges are aided in that way. That in itself is a sufficient answer to Mr. MEEKER's question. As I said, I am willing to admit that this proposition stands single and alone in the above respect, but that does not impeach its merits.

I wish to make reply to one further objection urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and in this respect I speak from practical experience. I refer in this connection to the inquiry propounded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN]. The facts that I will cite will show how mere theory must be rejected in the light of actual experience. The gentleman from Texas asked the gentleman from Massachusetts if he did not think that, if this bill went into effect, it would nullify the local spirit of road development, and lay a blight upon the present eager spirit of highway improvement existing throughout the United States. The gentleman from Massachusetts very promptly and enthusiastically agreed that it would. It happens that in the State of Virginia we operate under a system that is precisely analogous to the system that is proposed in this bill; and so far from having paralyzed the zeal of local endeavor, it has been a most helpful aid to road development in our Commonwealth.

Permit me to illustrate the workings of the Virginia system. If a county in that State desires to secure aid from the Commonwealth, it submits its proposition to the State highway commission. That commission sends its engineer to the county concerned. He investigates the project, determines its merit, and reports to Richmond. If the project is approved as meritorious, the highway department causes a survey to be made, and prepares plans. Then it says in substance to the county, "Build this road according to these plans, and when the road is completed we will pay one-half of the cost, out of your quota, as heretofore ascertained." I wish to say that this has been a decidedly helpful policy in aid of the development of good roads in Virginia. With that experience confronting me, I am able to answer, as I have said, from actual knowledge, the question propounded by the gentleman from Texas, and assert with confidence that the pending bill would give a mighty impulse to road development in the entire continental United States.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, if it is not a fact that his own State of Virginia has more miles of unimproved road in proportion to its mileage than any other State in the Union, or had last year?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That may be so. The State of Virginia has not been so fortunately situated with respect to its financial affairs, as the State from which the gentleman comes.

The Civil War left us prostrate in every way, and burdened with a heavy ante-bellum State debt. Crippled, wounded, oppressed with the problems of reconstruction, the Commonwealth of Virginia heroically undertook to pay a large portion of the indebtedness incurred before it was dismembered, and trampled under foot by marching armies. Bowed down under the burden of that indebtedness, which is as yet unpaid, we are open to the ungenerous reproach of the gentleman from Massachusetts. We admit that with better fortune and more ample means, Massachusetts has far exceeded us in the direction of road development. Still, we have not been altogether remiss in this matter, as the following figures will show:

Total amount of bonds issued by the counties for road making between July 1, 1906, and September 30, 1915, $7,151,100.

Number of miles of macadam and other roads constructed under the supervision of the highway commission during the above period, 3,762.49 miles.

Number of counties in which work was carried on under the supervision of the highway commission during the year ending September 15, 1915, 97 counties.

Total road mileage under construction in the above year by the commission, 846.55 miles.

Cost of same, $1,893,190.

This work is continually growing.

Mr. SIMS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. I notice in the bill that the amount is limited to $25,000,000 per year.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. That, of course, will not bind any future Congress.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Of course not.

Mr. SIMS. Further, would it not be rather in the way of development? Would it not practically require the States of the whole Union not to take more than $25,000,000 a year unless they could participate in the fund?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The scheme of this bill is as equitable a system of distribution as I believe can be worked out. I have already called the attention of the gentlemen who clamorously insist that certain great tax paying States, as they describe them, will contribute an unequal proportion of this money, to the fact that those same great tax paying States will receive by far the greater proportion of the fund to be expended under this bill. The State of New York will get something like a million and a half, out of this $25,000,000.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I want to say to the gentleman that I approve of this bill as a whole; and I want to say, too, what the gentleman said in regard to the working of the law in Virginia is true as to the working of a similar law in Michigan.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am very glad to have the support of the gentleman's experience.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Appropriations have been made by the Legislature of Michigan to pay State awards for the construction of roads, to assist communities in building roads, and to encourage the building of roads by the communities.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman a question. There was some criticism because the Federal Government is asked to contribute large sums of money and was to have no control whatever over the road after it is built. Would it not be wise or proper to have inserted in this bill a provision to the effect that no road which is built or improved by contribution of Federal money shall ever be made a toll road?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Well, I am not prepared to say at this moment whether that would be a wholesome limitation, but I do not reject the suggestion. Of course I am not in a position to accept it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There are not as many toll roads as there used to be, but in some States I guess there are some now.

Mr. SAUNDERS. There are some in Virginia.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. So as to be sure they would be used always for the general benefit and not for private profit. Some of these roads have tollgates maintained by private interests. Would it not be wise to have a provision that no road which was constructed or maintained, or on which Federal money had been expended, could be made a toll road?

Mr. SAUNDERS. As I say, that is a suggestion that is well worthy of consideration and discussion, but I am not prepared just now, speaking for myself, to say that I accept it. Of course I do not reject it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia has expressed his doubt as to whether the State of New York would be willing to expend a sum equivalent to that allotted to it under this bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I did not suggest that. I said I doubted whether the contribution in the way of taxes which the State of New York will contribute to the fund of $25,000,000 would be as much as the amount that it will receive under this bill. It may, or it may not. I do not know.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the gentleman if he is aware that the expenditures in the State of New York in the year 1913 for highways was $13,820,000?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I did not know the figures, but I knew that the State of New York had made great expenditures upon its roads in recent years. New York is a very rich State. I wonder whether this money came from the rural communities where it was expended, or mainly from the great municipalities.

Mr. WALSH. I understood the gentleman to challenge it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, I did not challenge it. You were complaining with respect to the appropriation for this Federal road fund that the big, rich States would pay an unjust and disproportionate amount. I simply said that under this $25,000,000 apportionment the State of New York would get something like $1,500,000, and I doubted if the amount she would pay in the way of taxes to make up the fund of $25,000,000 would amount to $1,500,000. I do not know whether it would, or not. It is immaterial.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. I favor the general purpose of this legislation, but the gentleman has asked for criticism——

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. We desire to work out a well-guarded bill.

Mr. SLOAN. Suppose the Appropriation Committee, having discretion to appropriate all the way from one cent to millions of dollars, should in view of the condition of the Treasury say that they would appropriate only $5,000,000 a year, does the gentleman think this would be a fair arrangement among the States to give them, first, the arbitrary factor of $65,000 and divide the other differentials in accordance with the scope of the bill?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. If the gentleman can work out a more equitable plan, present it in the way of an amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. Suppose, for instance, they would appropriate $4,000,000 instead of $5,000,000, it would all be distributed, would it not, on the first fixed factor?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman think it a wise proposition to leave it in that form?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. I do not think any State should receive less than $65,000, because we did not consider that a less sum than that could be economically administered by the Secretary of Agriculture in the several States. That was the reason for arbitrarily setting aside $65,000. An amendment might make it $25,000 or $50,000, or whatever was decided upon.

Mr. GORDON rose.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GORDON. I wish to inquire whether or not the gentleman from Virginia really believes there is any close analogy, or any analogy at all, between the relations existing between the several States and their several political subdivisions, townships, and counties, and relations between the Federal Government and the States?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Suppose I answer no?

Mr. GORDON. Then I contend your illustration very far fetched, because——

Mr. SAUNDERS. My illustration would not fail at all, because it is not dependent upon the exact character of the relationship. It was given merely to illustrate the manner in which these subdivisions would approach the superior authority. It does not make any difference what the relationship may be. In the relation between the State, and the county, the State has supervision of this project to see that the State money is justly expended in the counties. Under this bill the Department of Agriculture will see that the amount of money that the Government of the United States puts into a project in a State is adequately and properly expended in that State. We need not go into any technical quibbling about the exact character of the relationship under the Federal Constitution between the States, and the Government, as compared with the relation between the States, and the counties.

Mr. GORDON. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in the different subdivisions of the State the money is spent under State supervision, and the State has absolute control.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Under this bill every dollar will be controlled and expended under the supervision of the Federal Government, so far as the Federal Government contributes a dollar toward any individual project.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that the enactment of this bill will make unnecessary the continuance of the emergency-tax law or war-tax act?

Mr. SAUNDERS. There are some questions I do not think ought to be asked, because they imply a reflection upon the intelligence either of the gentleman who asks them, or of the gentleman of whom they are asked. [Applause.] I do not care to make any other answer to the question.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman does not care to answer that question I would like to ask if he knows the proportion which the State of New York pays of the taxes levied under the emergency-tax law?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No. I am entirely indifferent as to that. If New York pays a large proportion of those taxes, that fact merely shows that her people have prospered more than the rest of the country. That is all. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. And that is the reason you want to enforce this additional burden upon them?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is not a bad reason. If you suggest it as a reason I will accept the suggestion.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. In the matter of the Federal Government contributing money for the construction of roads in a State and having nothing to do with the use of the money, or the question of what control the Government should have along the line of inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON],

I will say there is precedent for this kind of expenditure, and this proposed character of regulation, under the Lever law, under which money is contributed by the Federal Government for use by the State for farm management and farm demonstration.

The law requires that the agricultural college of the State shall submit a proposition, or rather a plan of operation, for the next succeeding year to the Department of Agriculture, and that plan shall be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture. Then the money is turned over bodily to the agricultural college, and the agricultural college expends it as it sees fit. It reports to the Secretary of Agriculture the manner in which the money has been expended, and thereafter money can be withheld if the money already received, or before that time received, was not properly expended. It is about on the line of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. With respect to the payment of taxes, the rich man in New York pays in proportion to what he owns, the rich man in Virginia does likewise. If there are more rich men in New York than in Virginia, then they are just that much better off than we are, and we do not begrudge them their good fortune. But if they have more, they ought to pay more, under any equitable system of taxation. The State contributes to build roads in Virginia, but we do not aid a single city with respect to its streets, although the cities of Virginia pay a large proportion of the road tax. I do not know of any system of taxation under which the expenditures in a community are limited to the taxes paid by that community.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts referred to the amount of taxes coming from these different States. Did not the committee itself make a part of the report those very lists so as to invite attention and discussion on the floor?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; and I tried to point out that the argument of my friend from Massachusetts was for that reason not well founded, and that the figures as to urban population that he criticizes, were deliberately put into the report by the committee, so that it would be readily seen that each State would receive a proper proportion of this road fund under the proposed scheme of distribution.

Is there a better scheme of distribution? Certainly the proportion of roads in the States which are used by the Federal Government in the transportation of its mails—and that is becoming an increasing proportion year by year—is a just factor for the purpose of determining the apportionment under this bill. Certainly the number of people in a State that will use the roads to be aided, is a just factor in considering the question of the amount to be expended in that State. Hence we have considered both road mileage, and population, in the solution of the problem. Whatever inequality may be done by one factor of the apportionment, we think is measurably corrected by the other.

If anyone on this floor can work out a juster system of apportionment than that which has been worked out by the committee, I would be glad if he would submit it. I think the system adopted by the committee is entirely fair, and it is precisely the system that the House last year favored by a vote of about 7 to 1 on the passage of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Would it not be a good plan to take the number of automobiles owned as a basis?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Well, if the gentleman wishes, he can put his suggestion in the form of an amendment, and submit it.

Now, one word with reference to my State. While the State of Virginia is not, for the reasons that I have mentioned, as bountifully supplied with good roads as other States more fortunately situated with respect to their financial resources, I wish to say that we are not as badly off as the figures of State construction would indicate. The greater proportion of the roads in Virginia are built by the counties. We have counties in the State of Virginia which have bonded themselves for road purposes in amounts running from $500,000 to $1,000,000. The roads in those counties are just as good roads as those in the State of my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps the gentleman may have the information. There is a road running from Washington down to Virginia. How much has the General Government contributed toward the building of that road?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not know. I expect my friend is better apprised as to the facts of that case than I am.

Mr. MANN. No; I do not know what the amount is, but I know that the General Government has contributed some. I do not know just on what excuse it was, but I suspect——

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, that was possibly a road leading to Arlington Cemetery.

Mr. MANN. No; way down into Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS. To Mount Vernon, possibly?

Mr. MANN. No; not that.

Mr. SAUNDERS. To the Government experimental farm beyond the Potomac, perhaps.

Mr. MANN. No; they have a road leading to Alexandria and down in that neighborhood.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Well, anything that would help Alexandria would be justified, I reckon. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. Anything which would help the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] would meet my approval, and I have no doubt that this is what caused them perhaps to call it the "Carlin Road"—for the reason that he had gotten this money out of the Treasury.

Mr. SAUNDERS. What I have said with respect to road construction in Virginia was merely by the way. The counties of Virginia in the last few years, particularly under the impulse of the system of State aid that now prevails there, have expended many million dollars in the betterment of our roads.

Pass this bill and we will spend many millions more. I submit this measure to the House committee, fully believing that we have worked out a measure that will meet the just expectations of every advocate of road development in the United States; a bill which is in aid of the interests of all the people in all the States. I do not stop to measure the benefits that it will confer, or forecast its beneficent influence, for no man can measure the benefits that will accrue to our entire country, from the establishment of such a system of highways as this bill contemplates. I submit this bill to you in the full confidence that it is justly conceived, adequately framed, and destined to accomplish great results of betterment in every State of the Union. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition, and will then yield to the gentleman from Missouri to move that the committee rise.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. We will take care of the gentleman from Illinois in the morning. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUCKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7617) to provide that the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall, in certain cases, aid the States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

ALASKAN ENGINEERING COMMISSION (H. DOC. NO. 610).

The Speaker laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of the Congress, reports of the Alaskan Engineering Commission, in two volumes, for the period from March 12, 1914, the date of the approval of the Alaskan Railroad act (38 Stat., 305), to December 31, 1915, inclusive, together with accompanying maps, charts, and profiles.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 19, 1916.

The SPEAKER. The message is referred to the Committee on the Territories and ordered printed, without the accompanying documents.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1773) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near Kermit, W. Va.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On January 14, 1916:

H. R. 136. An act granting an extension of time to construct a bridge across Rock River at or near Colona Ferry, in the State of Illinois.

H. R. 4717. An act to authorize Butler County, Mo., to construct a bridge across Black River.

On January 17, 1916:

S. 2409. An act to authorize the Ohio-West Virginia Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Ohio River at the city of Steubenville, Jefferson County, Ohio.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 1773. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near Warfield, Ky., and Kermit, W. Va.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CLARK of Florida, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. CONRY, indefinitely, on account of illness.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. ANDERSON, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the following cases, no adverse reports having been made thereon:

Thomas O'Reilly (H. R. 7626), Sixty-third Congress;

Louisa M. Salim (H. R. 2185), Sixty-second Congress;

Louisa M. Sabin (H. R. 16351), Sixty-third Congress;

Lucie Bostian (H. R. 2186), Sixty-third Congress;

John Brin (H. R. 4625), Sixty-third Congress;

Melissa J. Gross (H. R. 7311), Sixty-third Congress;

George W. Bryant (H. R. 3423), Sixty-third Congress; and Benjamin F. Dayton (H. R. 7318), Sixty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request:

Mr. Moss of West Virginia asks permission to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies thereof, the papers in connection with the claim of Mrs. Harvey Sayre (H. R. 7136, 63d Cong.), upon which adverse action was taken by the Committee on Claims. (Rept. No. 442, Mar. 23, 1914, by Mr. MOTT, from the Committee on Claims.)

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this request?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, does that come from the Committee on Claims?

The SPEAKER. It is presented by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss].

Mr. MANN. It is quite customary to grant leave to withdraw papers where no adverse report has been made, but this is a case where an adverse report has been made. It seems to me some one on the Committee on Claims ought to give attention to the matter before the request is granted. I shall not object at this time, but I think they ought to know about it.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. On the 6th of December House joint resolution 14, laying an embargo on arms, ammunition, and submarines, was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. A change of reference is asked to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and, without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a petition and brief in support of a bill that I introduced to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a petition and brief in support of a bill which he introduced to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman seems to have rather a formidable looking document in his hand. What good will it do to print it in the RECORD, in fine print, which nobody will read? The committee before which the matter is pending can order it printed if it desires to. It is not customary to print the briefs of lawyers or of other people in the RECORD. I hope the gentleman will find out what he can get the committee to do before asking to put it in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

BUREAU OF LABOR SAFETY.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend some remarks in the RECORD on the bureau of safety labor bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, it is said that time at last sets all things even, and Goldsmith poetically argues that the blessings of Heaven to all mankind are about distributed equally. So it is with the conduct of the able gentleman who refers the bills in this House to the different committees. He manages to give to the committee of which I am chairman about as many bills to which the committee is not entitled as it takes away from its proper jurisdiction and gives to other committees. In point is the one just transferred from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. There is another bill, which I introduced myself, proposing an amendment to a law enacted on the report of the Committee on Military Affairs in the last session of Congress. The bill ought to go to that committee instead of to my committee. I have not the bill in my hand, but I will get the bill and the number and give it to the proper clerk, and I ask unanimous consent that the reference be changed from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman must have the number of the bill and not take any chances.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is the only bill that I introduced to correct the Panama bill at the last session.

Mr. MANN. I know what the bill is; I have read the bill. I objected to granting the request because it is such a loose way of doing business. The clerks could never keep track of them.

Mr. ADAMSON. It can not be very loose, because I will get the bill and give the number to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 59 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 20, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $7,500 for an increase in the salaries of the three Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury Department, from $5,000 to $7,500 each per annum (H. Doc. No. 595); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an amendment to estimate for salaries, office of the Supervising Architect, as printed on page 38 of the Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1917 (H. Doc. No. 596); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of War, submitting an amended estimate of appropriation under "Salaries, office of Quartermaster General," for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 597); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication of the Secretary of State submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $386 for the relief of John E. Jones, an American consul of class 3 (H. Doc. 598); to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Knapp Narrows, Md., with a view to securing a deeper channel between Tilghman Island and the mainland (H. Doc. No. 599); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

6. A letter from the Secretary of War transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on reexamination of Delaware River, N. Y., N. J., and Pa., at or near the mouth of the Neversink River (H. Doc. 600); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the Secretary of War transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on Morris Cove, New Haven Harbor, Conn., with a view to the construction of a harbor of refuge (H. Doc. 601); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

8. A letter from the Secretary of War transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Piscataway Creek, Prince Georges County, Md., and entrance thereto (H. Doc. No. 602); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

9. A letter from the Secretary of War transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Saugatuck Harbor and Kalamazoo River, Mich., with a view to securing increased depth to the town of Douglas (H. Doc. No. 608); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

10. A letter from the Secretary of War transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Columbia River at Kennewick, Wash. (H. Doc. No. 603); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

11. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting reports of bureau officers concerning typewriters, adding machines, and similar labor-saving devices exchanged during the fiscal year 1915, transmitting a further communication from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, explaining that there were no exchanges of this character in the Manila (P. I.) district during said year (H. Doc. No. 604); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

12. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Judge Advocate General of the Army, together with a list of leases granted by the Secretary of War during the calendar year 1915 (H. Doc. No. 605); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

13. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates in connection with the legislative, executive, and judicial bill (H. Doc. No. 606); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

14. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Comptroller of the Currency, amending his estimate of appropriation on page 43 of the Annual Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1917, for "Salaries, office of Comptroller of the Currency" (H. Doc. No. 607); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

15. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Public Printer, submitting urgent estimates of deficiencies in appropriations for the Government Printing Office (H. Doc. No. 609); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII:

Mr. KEY of Ohio, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 54) to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 59), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2202) granting an increase of pension to Martha Ann Benjamin; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 3844) granting an increase of pension to C. W. Kerlee; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 6330) granting a pension to Joseph F. Flynn; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 20, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek Thy favor and grace and guidance for the duties of this new day. Our duties are ever increasing; our responsibilities are more and more with every coming day. By Thy grace we have erected a great empire and by Thy grace alone shall we be enabled to project the policies which carry out the plans and secure the permanency of our Nation's life, and the development of all its resources. Grant us Thy guidance and blessing as Thou hast given Thy guidance and blessing to the fathers. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REFUNDS OF DRAWBACKS (S. DOC. NO. 248).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which will be read.

The communication was read and ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 18, 1916.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a copy of the Senate resolution, dated the 10th instant, directing me to submit to the Senate a statement showing certain data relative to applications for, and payment of, drawbacks under paragraph O, Section IV, of the present tariff act, for various periods.

In reply I have to state that instructions have been given to various collectors of customs to forward the required data to the department, where it will be compiled and submitted to the Senate with the least possibly delay. I may add that the clerical labor involved, requiring as it does reference to every drawback transaction in the Customs Service for a period of two and a half years, will consume considerable time, but that the same will be expedited in every possible way.

Respectfully,

W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

WATER-POWER SITES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, January 17, 1916.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: In accordance with the provisions of Senate resolution No. 544, passed by the Sixty-third Congress, third session, I have the honor to transmit herewith the information in my possession as to the ownership and control of the water-power sites in the United States; showing what proportion of such water-power sites is in private ownership and by what companies and corporations such sites in private ownership are owned and controlled; what horsepower has been developed and what proportion of it is owned and controlled by such private companies and corporations; and facts bearing upon the question as to the existence of a monopoly in the ownership and control of hydroelectric power in the United States.

Respectfully, D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know what to do with the accompanying papers.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the matter be printed as a public document. It contains valuable information.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Here it is [indicating].

Mr. MYERS. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing, then.

Mr. OVERMAN. It seems to me that as the question is being dealt with by the Committee on Commerce it ought to go to that committee.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. OVERMAN. The question of constitutionality is being considered by the Committee on the Judiciary and also by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SMOOT. The subject matter, however, is before the Committee on Public Lands. I think the communication and accompanying papers ought to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, they will go to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 65. An act to ratify, approve, and confirm an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to certain gas, electric light and power, telephone, railroad, and street railway companies and franchises in the Territory of Hawaii, and amending the laws relating thereto;

H. R. 153. An act to create a Bureau of Labor Safety in the Department of Labor;

H. R. 407. An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes;

H. R. 3042. An act to ratify, approve, and confirm sections 1, 2, and 3 of an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory, as herein amended, and amending the laws relating thereto; and

H. R. 6241. An act to ratify, approve, and confirm an act amending the franchise granted to H. P. Baldwin, R. A. Wadsworth, J. N. S. Williams, D. C. Lindsay, C. D. Lufkin, James L. Coke, and W. T. Robinson, and now held under assignment to Island Electric Co. (Ltd.), by extending it to include the Makawao district on the island of Maui, Territory of Hawaii, and extending the control of the Public Utilities Commission of the Territory of Hawaii to said franchise and its holder.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MYERS. I present a letter in the nature of a petition from Hon. A. M. Alderson, secretary of state of Montana, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD with his signature.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF MONTANA, SECRETARY OF STATE,
Helena, January 14, 1916.

To the PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: In 1907 reconnoissance and preliminary surveys were begun upon the Flathead irrigation project in northwestern Montana.

In 1908 a construction upon the project was authorized and the first appropriation made by act of Congress. In 1909 actual construction was begun.

In spite of the fact that since the beginning of actual work in 1909 more than six years have elapsed, the project is now only 22.2 per cent completed.

The Flathead project is the largest and most comprehensive Indian irrigation scheme ever undertaken in the United States. The area of the completed project is about 152,000 acres. There is not the slightest question but what all of these lands would easily pay the water-construction charge of $45 an acre, or even more, if necessary.

There has been a large amount of settling upon these lands, but the people have found, to their sorrow, that they are unable to make a living without irrigation. They have been led to believe, and were entitled to believe, that the Government of the United States would complete this project.

It never can be completed within the lifetime of a settler now upon the project with such insignificant appropriations as have been made in recent years. A large amount of the work already accomplished will go to pieces and its value will be lost unless the work is pushed to final accomplishment.

The State of Montana is firmly of the opinion that an appropriation of $1,000,000 should be made for the Flathead project this year of 1916, and we ardently hope that the Congress of the United States will recognize the necessity for such an appropriation.

I have the honor to remain,
Sincerely, yours,

A. M. ALDERSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. MYERS. I present the petition of pupils of the Reservoir Valley School, in Montana, praying for an appropriation for the Flathead reclamation project in that State. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD with the name of the first signer and underneath the words "and many others" and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESERVOIR VALLEY SCHOOLHOUSE.

To the PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES:

The undesigned, pupils of the Reservoir Valley Schoolhouse, do most urgently and respectfully petition of Congress that an appropriation of not less than $1,000,000 be passed by this session of Congress for work on the Flathead irrigation project for the ensuing year. This schoolhouse is located within the Flathead project and our education will depend to a large extent on the manner that this project is prosecuted.

Respectfully,

VENUS CAFFREY,
(And many others).

Mr. ASHURST. I present resolutions in the nature of a petition, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the resolutions were read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

Whereas the Grand Canyon of the Colorado has been set aside by the President of the United States as a public monument; and

Whereas every part of this great region should be made accessible and usable in the largest degree to the public, as well as preserved for the good of generations to come; and

Whereas if this public monument were made a national park, the necessary care and attention could and would be given to it by the United States Government for the benefit of the present generation and posterity: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Yavapai County Chamber of Commerce, through its board of directors, this 13th day of January, 1916, That they do hereby recommend and earnestly urge that the Grand Canyon of the Colorado be made a national park at the earliest date expedient; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to Secretary of the Interior Franklin K. Lane, to Senators HENRY F. ASHURST and MARCUS A. SMITH, and to Representative CARL HAYDEN; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the various commercial organizations of Arizona, together with the request that they cooperate in every way to help secure the proper legislation.

Approved.

C. E. YOUNT, President.

Attest:

GRACE M. SPARKES, Secretary.

Mr. ASHURST. I present resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Yavapai County, Ariz. The resolutions relate to a delicate subject, and I ask that they be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WARREN. I have a telegram from the National Wool Growers' Association, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

SALT LAKE, UTAH, January 19, 1916.

Senator F. E. WARREN,
Washington, D. C.:

Probably Gov. Gooding, of Idaho, and myself will leave for Washington to-day. If we do not reach there in time, it is imperative that the stock trails provided for in the homestead bills should be at least 1 mile wide. You must remember that in order to reach forest reserves and shipping points sheep will have to be in these trails as long as 15 days, with no feed other than that furnished by the trails. Certainly no man should be allowed to make an additional entry unless it adjoins his original entry. We hope action on the bill can be delayed until we reach Washington, and we hope that the Senate will wait for the recommendations of the committee.

NATIONAL WOOL GROWERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Monroe, Mich., praying for the imposition of a duty on dyestuffs, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the University Club of Harbor Springs, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit interstate commerce in the products of child labor, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of S. A. Valentine Camp, No. 21, Department of Michigan, United Spanish War Veterans, of Escanaba, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GRONNA. I have here resolutions adopted by the Devils Lake District Medical Society, of North Dakota, calling attention to the lack of a sufficient number of medical officers in the Regular Army. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEVILS LAKE DISTRICT MEDICAL SOCIETY,
Devils Lake, North Dakota.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the Devils Lake District Medical Society January 11, 1916, the following resolution was passed and a copy ordered sent to the Secretary of War and our Senators and Congressmen:

"Whereas the President and the honorable Secretary of War have announced in the public press that a scheme for the reorganization of the Army will be presented to Congress at its coming session which will materially increase the military establishment; and

"Whereas we recall the indignant protests and criticisms of the Nation at the failure to provide adequately for the sick and wounded at the beginning of the Civil War and the Spanish-American War; and

"Whereas it is known that this failure was due to the lack of a sufficient number of medical officers in the Regular Army and a means for increasing the medical establishment at the outbreak of war; and

"Whereas in spite of the lessons of the Spanish-American War, which were fresh in mind in the reorganization of the Army in 1901, the medical department was not properly increased, and no provision was made for its expansion in time of emergency; and

"Whereas to correct the defects in the 1901 legislation subsequent legislation was necessary, in which the medical profession of the United States was called on to assist: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Devils Lake Medical Society of North Dakota, That the Secretary of War be petitioned to make adequate provision in the reorganization of the Army about to be presented to Congress for a sufficient number of medical officers for the regular establishment, which provision should aggregate a proportion of medical officers of at least seventy-five hundredths of 1 per cent of the enlisted strength of the Army, or such number as the Surgeon General of the Army may deem necessary; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary be petitioned to make provision in this reorganization for the expansion of the medical department at the beginning of war by calling into service in the Medical Reserve Corps physicians from civil life who have been instructed in their special duties as medical officers in our summer camps and otherwise, as the War Department may see fit."

G. F. DREW,
Secretary Devils Lake Medical Society.

Mr. HARDING presented memorials of sundry citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against an additional tax on intoxicating liquors, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Mansfield, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented petitions of the congregation of the Congregational Church of Norwalk, of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Norwalk, and of sundry citizens of North Olmsted, all in the State of Ohio, praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of the congregation of the Congregational Church of Norwalk, of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Norwalk, and of sundry citizens of North Olmsted, all in the State of Ohio, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the pure-food law to make misdemeanors false and fraudulent statements regarding curative qualities of medicines, which were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented petitions of the congregation of the Congregational Church of Norwalk, of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Norwalk, and of sundry citizens of North Olmsted, all in the State of Ohio, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Sandusky Council, Knights of Columbus, of Sandusky, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to set aside October 12 as Columbus Day, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry inmates of the Soldiers' Home of Sandusky, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented a petition of sundry citizens of New York City, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide a fixed price for trade-marked and patented articles, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Memorial Baptist Church, of Albany, N. Y., praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of B. F. Gladding & Co., of South Otselic, N. Y., praying for the imposition of a duty on dyestuffs, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WEEKS presented a petition of Local Lodge No. 413, Loyal Order of Moose, of Quincy, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Boston, Mass., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to grant the right of suffrage to women, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Methodist Preachers' Association, of Springfield, Mass., remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the American Writing Paper Co., of Holyoke, Mass., praying for the imposition of a duty on dyestuffs, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented a petition of the congregation of the Whitney Avenue Memorial Christian Church, of Washington, D. C., praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram which I have just received. It is short.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

DOUGLAS, WYO., January 20, 1916.

Senator CLARK, Washington, D. C.:

Please withhold action on homestead and leasing bill just passed by House until you can hear from a delegation appointed by the National Wool Growers and a delegation to be appointed by the American National Live Stock Association at El Paso 25th to 27th this month, if possible to do so. Please answer.

J. M. WILSON.

OIL LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram bearing upon the proposed legislation affecting the oil industry in California. I ask to have it read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CAL., January 19, 1916.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Please have following petition read in Senate immediately:

"To the President and Congress of the United States:

"A multitude of citizens of the United States, some thousands in number, who are the threatened victims of legislation concerning oil lands now pending in the National Congress, hereby beg leave to enter protest against any precipitate and hurried legislation upon the subject referred to. The bills as now pending bear every evidence of superficiality in their sweeping emasculation of long-established statutory laws which have been the basis of a rational and uniform development of the national domain for over a half century. They absolutely wreck a most important division of the national land system and leave in confusion the legal status of vested rights acquired by a large element of worthy and industrious citizens who are seeking to acquire property under laws sanctified by long usage. The bills referred to bear strong evidence of having been inspired by those who have been the recipients of munificent donations from the General Government and whose holdings are now the subject of judicial inquiry. The proposed enactments are not only confiscatory but are punctuated with ambiguities which will require an untold amount of litigation to determine their legal significance. If such legislation is enacted it will paralyze every effort of the man of modest means who has withstood the privations and severities of a desert country in seeking mineral wealth, believing that the legislatures and courts of both State and Nation would insure to him the full protection of rights acquired by him under the established mineral laws of the United States, which have been in full force and operation for many decades. Any law which imperils or destroys property rights thus acquired can only result in intensifying and expanding the growing popular idea that it is the purpose of the Government to preserve the public domain for the exclusive benefit of the rich and powerful and add to the difficulties of the poor who are seeking to acquire property rights by a strict conformity to the laws of the land. The bills which are pending before the House and Senate should each be entitled 'A law for the establishment of a monopoly of all fuel and power for the benefit of those who have already been enriched by donations from the public domain.' No possible statute could more effectually create and perpetuate such a monopoly, as no private individual or association of persons outside of the great interests themselves could acquire any portion of the public domain by lease with any possible hope of producing an article of commerce therefrom with the handicap of Government supervision and taxation and market such article in competition with those who have already received vast donations of public mineral lands and are exempt forever from any burdens of public surveillance and onerous royalties. The vast majority of legislators have received no information emanating from the private operator in the field except that which has been manipulated and mutilated by influences in close touch with those who frame the laws and give them color and effect. The small operator and prospector have been totally ignored, and their plea for consideration has been smothered by the adroitness of preponderating wealth and sinister politics. Already the atmosphere is becoming malodorous with sensational charges of a political and financial nature which promise to culminate in scandals unequaled in national legislation. Your petitioners enter an earnest plea that all legislation of this character may be delayed until proper consideration can be given to same unmixed with and unsmothered by the tumultous clamor over international affairs. It is no time for revolutionary legislation touching purely domestic questions, whose consideration is overshadowed by world affairs which now completely absorb the popular mind, and it is the almost universal opinion of those best advised that this particular hour and condition has been selected to perpetrate this ill-advised and outrageous legislative felony. The President and Congress will at an early date receive expression from the thousands whose little all is at stake through the medium of mass meetings held for this purpose for the reasons above stated. A rational delay on such drastic legislation is hereby impleaded."

FREIGHT CONGESTION AT OCEAN DOCKS.

Mr. WORKS. I also send up a letter from the Chamber of Commerce, of Santa Cruz, Cal., on the subject of the congestion of freight at ocean docks, and ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Chamber of Commerce of Santa Cruz urgently calls the attention of Congress to the congestion of freight at ocean docks which is seriously threatening the prosperity of the Nation in general and of the Northwest in particular.

Millions of tons of freight, the products of our farms and factories, are piling up in freight cars, in storage, and on the wharves at water terminals, unable to find bottoms for transportation to the markets of the world. Far from offering relief, the situation assumes a graver aspect every day and must inevitably cause reaction, which may cause a material depression in the price of farm products and stagnation in the work of our factories.

Our farmers and merchants are losing, perhaps forever, the new opportunities and the new markets now open before them, because of a state of paralysis in international means of transportation and the greed of foreign shipowners over which our Government has no jurisdiction: It is therefore

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be urged to speedily adopt emergency measures to adequately meet this situation and to place at the disposal of the President full power to employ all the executive agencies of the Government for the purpose of reopening the congested arteries of trade.

S. A. PALMER, President.
A. S. T. JOHNSON, Secretary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NORRIS, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 710) to authorize national banking associations to avail themselves of State laws providing for the guaranteeing of deposits, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 61) thereon.

Mr. STONE. By direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 3264) to authorize the payment of an indemnity to the Norwegian Government for the detention of three subjects of Norway in Hudson County, N. J., and I submit a report (No. 60) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. CATRON. From the Committee on Claims, I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 1878) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section No. 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code, and I submit a report (No. 59) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BROWNS FERRY BRIDGE, MISSOURI.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 4716) to authorize Dunklin County, Mo., and Clay County, Ark., to construct a bridge across St. Francis River, and I submit a report (No. 58) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ST. FRANCIS RIVER BRIDGE, MISSOURI.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 6448) to authorize Butler and Dunklin Counties, Mo., to construct a bridge across St. Francis River, and I submit a report (No. 57) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OVERMAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of John G. Young (S. 3237, 63d Cong.) be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PUGET SOUND CANAL, WASHINGTON.

Mr. JONES submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 11), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause preliminary examination and survey to be made and a report to be made thereon to Congress of the intervening territory between Puget Sound and the Columbia River, with a view to determining the advisability of constructing a canal connecting Puget Sound with Grays Harbor, Willapa Harbor, and the Columbia River.

STRATEGIC VALUE OF INLAND WATERWAYS (S. DOC. NO. 249).

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I have here an address delivered by the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] at the eighth annual convention of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association, held at Savannah, Ga., the 9th of November last, on the subject of the strategic value of inland waterways. It is a most exhaustive and illuminating discussion of the necessity of the improvement and enlargement of our coastwise waterways. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXPORTATION OF LOGWOOD FROM JAMAICA.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have a letter from Hon. Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, in reference to the question of the embargo on the exportation of logwood from Jamaica. As this is a matter which concerns very deeply the textile industries of the country, as well as certain other industries, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. STONE. The letter just presented by the Senator from New Hampshire concerns logwood imported from what country?

Mr. GALLINGER. It relates directly to the embargo on the exportation of logwood from Jamaica, but it touches other countries.

Mr. STONE. Would it not be well to have the letter, after it is printed, referred to the Committee on Finance?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it ought to be done, and I ask that that course be taken.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 15, 1916.

The Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate.

SIR: With reference to previous correspondence with this department in regard to the British embargo on the exportation of logwood from Jamaica, I have the honor to inform you that the department is in receipt of the following cablegram from the American ambassador at London, dated January 13, 1916:

"Foreign office now informs me that as urgent requirements of Great Britain have been met, governor of Jamaica has issued general license permitting export of logwood chips and logwood extract to all British, United States, French, and Italian ports, and that instructions are being sent to governor of British Honduras to issue similar license. It is added that in informing me of measures taken by British Government to facilitate relaxation of embargo in favor of manufacturers in United States it is desired to explain that relaxation must necessarily be conditional on British Government being satisfied that supply of dyewood extract from United States to Canada will be resumed on reasonable scale, and states that they have no doubt but that I will be in a position to give this assurance in view of efforts which have been made by British authorities to meet convenience of American manufacturers.

"Please instruct me if I can give the assurance that dyewood extract is being sent from United States to Canada."

As the lifting of the embargo on logwood in favor of manufacturers in the United States is made conditional on the British Government being satisfied that the supply of dyewood extract from the United States to Canada will be resumed on a reasonable scale, the question of whether American firms are able to obtain logwood from Jamaica and British Honduras will depend on whether the manufacturers of logwood extract, of whom the department is informed there are only two or three, are willing to resume exportation to Canada on a reasonable scale. The department has as yet received no assurances from manufacturers of logwood extract that they will do this.

Information received from American consular officers stationed along the Caribbean coasts and in the West Indies, in response to instructions from the Department of State, directing them to ascertain what supplies of logwood were available for shipment to the United States, indicate that at the present time the only available supply of logwood outside of Jamaica and British Honduras is apparently in Haiti with the possibility of the development of a supply on a reasonable scale from the districts surrounding Barranquilla, Colombia.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
ROBERT LANSING.

SEIZURES OF COTTON AND FOODSTUFFS BY GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, at an earlier day during the session I had an opportunity to address the Senate with reference to the orders in council of March 1 and March 11, passed by Great Britain. I then called attention to the fact that the order of March 11 was, in effect, a declaration of blockade against all the ports of Germany; that it was a direction to enforce that blockade by seizing neutral vessels before they passed the straits which separated Denmark, Norway, and Sweden; that so far as Norway and Sweden and the Baltic coast were concerned it was ineffective and illegal, on account of the fact that Great Britain could not blockade the ports of Germany on the Baltic against the vessels of Norway and Sweden; and that no blockade can be enforced legally unless it is enforced against all neutrals alike.

I also called attention to the fact that this order directed the seizure of the commerce of neutrals going into and out of neutral ports without regard to the character of the goods, if those goods were of presumed German origin or destination.

The illegality of those orders, their disregard of recognized rules of international law, is so apparent that no real effort has been made in Great Britain to defend them. We now hear that Great Britain is about to recede from those two orders. I am not surprised at that. No British statesman of any prominence now a part of the British Government or who is in Parliament has failed within the past 12 years upon the floor of Parliament to denounce as illegal the very procedure of Great Britain which is being conducted at the present time under the order of council of March 11.

We are told that with the repeal of the orders of March 1 and March 11 by the privy council we are to have a direction for a real, genuine blockade of German ports, and that the effect of that action will be to tighten the blockade, and to still further restrict the trade of neutrals with Germany. Some of our newspaper correspondents are, thoughtlessly I hope, scattering the idea that, with a complete declaration of blockade, some increased right of interference will be given to the British Government.

Mr. President, if a declaration of absolute blockade were made, it would change the present status only to this extent: The present order in council leaves it to the discretion of the prize courts as to how they shall handle goods of neutrals seized when seeking to reach blockaded ports. The complete order of blockade would simply subject the vessels and their cargoes seeking to reach blockaded ports to confiscation. But, Mr. President, no neutral vessels are seeking to enter German ports that are now blockaded. Our real contest with Great Britain is the interference with our trade through neutral ports, and no blockade can extend to neutral ports. Blockade is an act of war; it is a part of the process of war directed toward an enemy's soil. It can not be directed toward the soil of a neutral.

On a former occasion I presented to the Senate decision after decision by the courts of Great Britain sustaining the proposition that I have just laid down. I cited text-writer after text-writer, and English judicial decisions from distinguished English authors and jurists, in support of the proposition that a blockade can not reach a neutral port; that the right of interference at neutral ports is limited to the character of the goods. It can only be based on the contraband character of the goods, which means that their character is such that they will be used in war by the military or naval forces of the enemy of Great Britain.

Goods have been classified as "absolute" and "conditional contraband" to assist in deciding the question of evidence required to justify the seizure; "absolute," of such a warlike nature that, going to a belligerent country, they are presumed to be intended for the army, and therefore can be seized on account of their character; "conditional contraband," goods which might be so used, and which might also equally be used by noncombatants; and in this case no seizure can be made unless the belligerent seizing them establishes the fact that they are really to be used by the military and naval forces of the opposing belligerent, the burden being upon the belligerent seizing the goods to make the proof.

Mr. President, the English rule has been that conditional contraband going to a neutral port could not be seized at all. Let me illustrate by foodstuffs. Ten per cent of the people are probably in arms and 90 per cent noncombatants. There are, therefore, nine chances out of ten that the food might be used by the noncombatants. If it is to be so used, it has the right to go to an opposing belligerent through a neutral port untouched.

Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that, even though an absolute blockade is directed in the broadest sense, our State Department has already committed us, and correctly committed us, squarely to the proposition that such a blockade would give no right to seize innocent goods owned, by neutral citizens, sailing from neutral ports to neutral ports, even though those goods are to be sent to an opposing belligerent—to Germany or to Austria. I will read just a line from the letter of March 30 from our State Department sent to Great Britain:

It is confidently assumed that His Majesty's Government will not deny that it is a rule sanctioned by general practice that, even though a blockade should exist and the doctrine of contraband as to unblockaded territory be rigidly enforced, innocent shipments may be freely transported to and from the United States through neutral countries to belligerent territory without being subject to the penalties of contraband traffic or breach of blockade, much less to detention, requisition, or confiscation.

I quote, Mr. President, three other extracts from this letter, and I shall quote during my remarks a number of extracts from various papers. I will call attention to their substance, and ask leave now from the Senate to embody in the RECORD the exact language.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The quotation I have just read is an assertion of the right of citizens of neutral countries to trade with the enemies of Great Britain through neutral ports in noncontraband goods. This is an assertion of the right without regard to the orders of March 1 and March 11 last, and even though a formal blockade were declared.

Again, the letter states:

And no claim on the part of Great Britain of any justification for interfering with these clear rights of the United States and its citizens as neutrals could be admitted. To admit it would be to assume an attitude of unneutrality toward the present enemies of Great Britain which would be obviously inconsistent with the solemn obligations of this Government in the present circumstances.

Again, the letter states:

But the novel and quite unprecedented feature of that blockade, if we are to assume it to be properly so defined, is that it embraces many neutral ports and coasts—bars access to them.

Again, it states:

It is manifest that such limitations, risks, and liabilities placed upon the ships of a neutral power on the high seas * * * are a distinct invasion of the sovereign rights of the nation whose ships, trade, or commerce is interfered with.

These and other strong expressions are found in this letter protesting as illegal any effort by Great Britain to blockade the neutral ports of northern Europe against the trade of neutral nations in neutral goods.

The course of Great Britain and the threatened course are well understood by British statesmen to be illegal.

Its continuance is so palpable a violation of the rights of neutrals that no self-respecting nation should submit to it.

Some, even in the United States, have replied that the exigencies of war excuse the British Government for disregarding the rights of American citizens.

I wish to submit a few authorities to show that no nation has a right by municipal regulation to set aside rules or international law and thereby interfere with the rights of trade of a neutral nation.

In second Dallas, the Supreme Court of the United States held "the municipal law of a country can not change the law of nations so as to bind the subjects of another nation."

Time and again the Department of State of the United States has declared a municipal decree "whether executive, legislative, or judicial, contravening the law of nations has no extra-territorial force."

Mr. Evarts, when Secretary of State, announced—

if a Government confesses itself unable or unwilling to conform to those international obligations which must exist between established Governments of friendly States, it would thereby confess that it is not entitled to be regarded or recognized as a sovereign or independent power.

When Ecuador undertook to set up by statute rules subversive of the principles of international law, our State Department declared that "Ecuador placed herself outside of the pale of international intercourse."

Sir Henry Maine, in his work upon international law, declares that—the State which disclaims the authority of international law places herself outside the circle of civilized nations.

In the first chapter of Moore's Digest of International Law many authorities upon this subject will be found.

The rules of international law come to us from the established customs of nations. The sovereignty of a nation extends to the commerce of her people upon the ocean; and no opposing nation can interfere with the merchandise of a citizen of another nation not at war, except where the customs of nations have conceded the right of seizure. No nation, by a municipal regulation, can set up a rule of its own in defiance of the customs of nations, and seize the goods of a neutral without being guilty of a lawless act.

But let us see for a moment why the regulation of the privy council is passed. Why are not simply orders issued to the naval forces to seize these vessels and stop this commerce? The reason is obvious. If the cases were permitted to go to the British prize courts with only the direction by the Government of Great Britain to its navy, the prize courts would decide the cases under the rules of international law, and the conduct of Great Britain would at once be stopped by releases in her prize courts of all these illegal seizures. But Great Britain, through her privy council, which is a legislative body, sets aside rules of international law and prescribes a new rule for the seizure of goods of neutrals. Her prize courts are bound by their order, and are prevented from following rules of international law.

There is but one remedy for a neutral nation. It is to contest the orders of the British Privy Council, to assert our rights as a nation. Our citizens can have no redress under these orders in British prize courts.

Treating as established the rules of international law sustained by authority and brought to the attention of the Senate on a previous occasion, I wish to ask consideration of the order of August 21 by the British Privy Council declaring cotton absolute contraband and then to point out the violation by Great Britain of the rights of citizens of the United States, both in its treatment of foodstuffs and of cotton.

COTTON CONTRABAND ORDER.

Never but once before has any country sought to interfere with the free shipment of cotton. It has been recognized as a commodity largely entering into the peaceful uses of the people of the world, and therefore has never been classified as contraband but once before.

This was in the case of Russia, during the Japanese war.

The pretext for the declaration was the use of cotton for the manufacture of powder and explosives. Great Britain promptly protested the action of Russia.

Russia yielded, and cotton continued to be shipped by subjects of Great Britain from India and Egypt to Japan.

I wish, first, to answer the defense of this action which has been widely circulated by English agents and pro-English newspapers.

It has been upon two lines:

First. That the United States made cotton contraband during the Civil War.

Second. That cotton is essential to the manufacture of powder and explosives in Germany, and by the suppression of cotton shipments into Germany the war power of Germany and her allies may be destroyed.

UNITED STATES NEVER DECLARED COTTON CONTRABAND.

As to the first of these claims, it is sillily false. The United States never made cotton contraband during the Civil War. This old story is fully exposed by Moore, in his Digest of International Law. A classification of contraband is based upon the unneutral nature of the goods, and authorizes one belligerent to prevent those goods from entering the country of an enemy nation. It is to keep the enemy from obtaining possession of goods which would be used for military purposes.

What would have been the sense of an order classifying cotton as contraband to prevent it from being shipped into the Southern States? Nobody wanted to ship it into the Southern States. It was already there. They had almost a monopoly of its production. The claim was false and stupid.

Yet, Sir Gilbert Parker, the publicity agent for Great Britain, distributed an article defending the order making cotton absolute contraband, written by Hon. Bernard R. Wise, and justifying the order upon the ground that the United States made cotton contraband during the Civil War.

Now let me deal with the second British excuse.

CONSPIRACY TO INJURE COTTON.

After depressing the price of cotton in the fall of 1914, the British spinners organized to depress the price again in 1915. One-third of the exports of American cotton normally go to Germany and Austria and the neutral ports of northern Europe. Germany and Austria alone consume nearly 3,000,000 of bales annually.

If the British spinners and cotton manufacturers could cut off this market for cotton raised in the United States, it would naturally depress the price. If they could cut it off, they would exclude the products of German mills from competing with the products of English mills throughout the world.

When the great patriotic gathering was held early in the summer of 1915 in London to demand that cotton should be made absolute contraband, that great soldier, Sir Charles McKara, presided at the meeting. His military record, so far as it is known, is limited to the office which he fills. He is president of the English Cotton Spinners' Association.

I can not believe that English statesmen were so poorly informed, or so lacked capacity for observation, that they did not understand the real purpose of the movement.

When Sir William Ramsey advocated in the London Times placing cotton on the absolute contraband list, he asserted that it was essential to the manufacture of explosives and most of the powder used by Germany. A far more distinguished British scientist flatly contradicted him. Mr. W. F. Reid, former president of the Society of Chemical Industry of Great Britain, spoke as follows before that society in London:

The whole thing is a great fraud. Eminent scientists have made erroneous statements on this subject. If people associated with science would speak only on the branches with which they are connected, the advantages would be very great.

COTTON NOT USED TO MAKE POWDER IN GERMANY.

I shall show by abundant evidence that for months before the order making cotton absolute contraband Germany had substituted wood cellulose for lint cotton in the production of powders. The use of cotton for the manufacture of powder has always been confined principally to what is called linters. Linters are the short waste scraped from cotton seed at the oil mill when the seed are being ground. Manufacturers' waste consists of the very short particles of cotton that fly off as the cotton is spun. Linters and manufacturers' waste, when used as a base for powder, are ground to pulp. They then become the base or filler which is treated with explosive acids to make powder.

Linters and manufacturers' waste are of but little ordinary value, and have usually sold at very low prices. They form a cheap and useful base for nitrocellulose powders. The manufacture of powders of this character by the use of cotton linters or waste began in 1854. Long before the war in Germany cellulose had been made from wood pulp, and this wood-pulp cellulose had occasionally been used as a substitute for cotton linters and manufacturers' waste in the manufacture of nitrocellulose powders.

Shortly after the war began it was published that Germany was abandoning the use of cotton linters and waste and building numerous plants for the manufacture of wood cellulose as a base or filler for nitrocellulose powders.

I am now prepared to show that for months past Germany has abandoned the use of cotton in the manufacture of powders and is using wood cellulose as the filler for its nitrocellulose powders.

President Lohman, of the Bremen Chamber of Commerce, is one of the foremost business men of Germany. In a speech delivered last month before the Bremen Chamber of Commerce he declared that for more than eight months Germany had used wood pulp as a substitute for cotton in the manufacture of nitrocellulose powders.

I have in my hand a letter from Dr. W. Will, director of the Central Bureau of Technico-Scientific Research of the University of Bremen. He declares that the chemists of Germany long before the war began understood the use of wood pulp as a substitute for cotton in the manufacture of nitrocellulose powders, and that for months past the substitute had been used in the German powder mills, and used with perfect success.

I ask that his letter be printed in the RECORD as an exhibit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The letter referred to is printed in the appendix at the end of Mr. SMITH's remarks.)

REPORT OF MR. BIBLE.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the early fall Mr. Howard W. Bible, of North Carolina, whom I have known for a number of years, a most reputable citizen of the United States, returning from Germany, assured me that the lack of linters or cotton was in no way affecting the manufacture of powders in Germany; that wood pulp was used as a substitute. He intended returning to Germany in a few weeks, and, at my request, he agreed to personally investigate the subject while in Germany and to give me his testimony on the result of his investigation.

Mr. Bible is now in Washington. I have in my hand a letter from him, prepared last week. He is ready to testify before any committee of Congress upon this subject. He points out in this letter that, on returning to Germany, in Bremen he presented letters from me to President Lohman and explained my desire, if cotton had ceased to be used in Germany for the manufacture of powder and explosives, to furnish proof of that fact for a protest I wished to make against the British order declaring cotton contraband.

President Lohman gave him his cordial support and arranged for a conference in Berlin between Mr. Bible and representatives of the various departments, that he might make his formal application to them for definite information and personal knowledge with reference to the use of cotton in the manufacture of gunpowder and explosives.

His letter states that, with President Lohman, he met representatives of the various departments by appointment in Berlin, and after presenting the objects of his investigation, he was assured by them that for months past the German Government had ceased to use cotton, and had with entire success substituted wood pulp in the manufacture of powder and explosives.

He was furnished a list of 60 mills in Germany engaged in the manufacture of wood cellulose, and also a list of munition plants, and authorized to visit such number as he saw fit, that he might have personal knowledge as to the materials therein used for the manufacture of powder.

He selected one plant, and, with Prof. Lohman and an officer of the German Government, he visited the plant; was permitted to go entirely through it, and found that all the raw material being brought in for manufacture into powder was wood cellulose, and that in some portions of the mill there were still rags used. He states that he found some cotton linters in the mill, but they had been laid aside, and were no longer used in the manufacture of powder.

He further states that he saw 3,000 bales of linters at one place which had been released by the munition department of the Government and disposed of to cotton factories.

I ask that Mr. Bible's letter be printed in full as an exhibit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have upon my desk packages of wood cellulose sent from Germany to me by Mr. Bible.

I defy anyone to produce proof to sustain the British claim. I was also advised by Mr. Bible that Col. Kuhn, our military attaché at Berlin, had been given the same opportunity to visit munition plants and to acquire the information that he, Mr. Bible, had acquired, and that Col. Kuhn was furnished the opportunity to know that Germany used no cotton in the manufacture of nitrocellulose powder.

I applied to the Secretary of War for Col. Kuhn's report. He could not give it to me. I have his letter here. First I applied orally. He explained to me the difficulty; that it was agreed between all countries that military attachés during a war were only permitted to remain in countries and make reports with the understanding that the neutral receiving them would regard them as absolutely confidential until the war was over, and for that reason he could not give me Col. Kuhn's report.

But the British embassy has admitted it. They did not intend to admit it, but they have admitted it. Yesterday, realizing that the false pretext upon which they justified their order making cotton absolute contraband had been and would be exploded, they issued a statement on the subject. I hold it in my hand. It begins:

The British military authorities have issued the following information with regard to the use of cotton for military purposes.

It goes on then to show how cotton can be used as a base for ballistite, cordite, and nitrocellulose powder. It shows how much is used of each when cotton is used as the base. It then says:

Apart from explosives, cotton forms the base of many fabrics and materials employed for military purposes, such as clothing, sheets—

And so forth.

I think we knew that before. I do not think it was a novel statement that sheets could be made out of cotton or that clothing could be made out of cotton. Then it closes:

The alleged use of substitutes for cotton in the manufacture of explosives does not affect the fact that cotton is a war material in general use.

What does that mean? About this: "We told you last summer that we made your cotton contraband, and we justified the order of March 1 and March 11, because by keeping cotton out of Germany we would end the war. We would put an end to Germany's munition-plant service; we would suppress their powder magazines, and leave her without anything in the shape of explosives to conduct the war. But now you know it is not so, and we say that even if it is not used for explosives, even though substitutes are used instead of cotton in Germany, still it is a war material in general use."

If anywhere among English writers or English statesmen before can be found such a statement, I invite its production. Nearly anything can be used in some way in connection with war. That does not make it contraband as war material. Cotton can be used to make sheets. But sheets are not limited to soldiers. Cotton can be used to make clothes, and clothes are not limited to soldiers.

The very distinction that is drawn in treating the merchandise of neutrals is that a belligerent can not strike down the trade of a neutral simply because it might be used for military purposes. Every decision of Great Britain, every text writer of Great Britain, and every statesman of Great Britain for the last hundred years dealing with the subject has denounced any claim of right to interfere with neutral trade simply because it might in some way be used by an enemy army or navy. The rule has been laid down without interruption that the belligerent seizing goods must prove that they were intended for the army and navy, and that they were not for the use of noncombatants.

COTTON ALWAYS FREE FROM SEIZURE BY A BELLIGERENT.

Having disposed of the two excuses given by Great Britain for making cotton absolute contraband, let us consider the status which this commodity occupied under the customs of nations with reference to naval warfare.

The great majority of the people of the world are clothed with goods manufactured from cotton. In times of war not over 10 per cent of the population would be engaged in active service. Therefore, 90 per cent of the population of any country engaged in war would require in their peaceful pursuits the use of goods manufactured from cotton.

Recognizing this fact, cotton has uniformly been classed as an article which no nation could make contraband, but which all neutrals could ship freely to belligerent countries.

RUSSIA YIELDS TO BRITISH VIEW.

As before stated, the one exception was in the case of Russia, which, in 1904, during the war with Japan, declared cotton absolute contraband. England protested this action by Russia in the following language:

The quantity of raw cotton that might be used for explosives would be infinitesimal in comparison with the bulk of the cotton exported from India to Japan for peaceful purposes, and to treat harmless cargoes of this latter description as unconditionally contraband would be to subject a branch of innocent commerce to a most unwarrantable interference.

This was Great Britain's view even before wood cellulose had been developed as a substitute for cotton.

Oh, what does this letter from the British embassy look like when we consider this action of Great Britain toward Russia? But not only Great Britain, the United States protested. Mr. Hay, Secretary of State, sent a splended letter to Russia on this subject. Among other things he said:

PROTEST BY MR. HAY.

Nor could the United States Government acquiesce in the treatment of raw cotton as absolutely contraband of war. While that product may enter to some extent into the manufacture of explosives and military clothing, the quantity of it used for such purposes is so far out of proportion to its uses in the arts of peace that the recognition of its treatment as absolutely contraband would, in principle, justify the same treatment of all forms of iron and steel, as well as wood, wool, all kinds of fuel, and all other materials which would be used in the manufacture of guns, carriages, or any other article of potentially military use, and would therefore be destructive of virtually all commerce of neutral States with the noncombatant population of belligerents. Cotton is one of the principal products of the United States. The crop for the year 1904 exceeds 12,000,000 bales. Its exportation from the United States is one of the principal items of its foreign commerce. To Japan alone the exportations of raw cotton during the periods specified were as follows:

	Raw cotton.
	Bales.	Pounds.	Value.
Year ending Dec. 31, 1903	83,434	44,651,240	$4,510,580
Eleven months ending Nov. 30, 1904	63,338	33,461,739	3,753,361

In view of the foregoing His Imperial Majesty's Government can not fail to perceive the deep concern with which the United States would view the establishment of precedents and the recognition of a principle which would work such disastrous consequences to its legitimate commerce with neutral States. According to the view of the United States Government expressed herein and in its circular of June 10 and its instructions of August 30 and September 1 last, the seizure and condemnation of neutral ships and goods on the broad grounds enunciated by Count Lamsdorff, would necessitate a radical change in the law of nations and in the procedure of prize tribunals, and would, if generally adopted, inflict incalculable injury upon great producing and exporting countries, like Russia and the United States, who are vitally concerned in the maintenance of the rights of legitimate commerce with the peoples of belligerent States.

Russia yielded, and the one exception of an effort by a nation to make cotton contraband having been abandoned by that nation on the protests of neutrals, emphasizes the rule that the customs of nations has fixed cotton as a commodity which can not be made contraband.

The story has been heralded by the press that Germany has declared cotton absolute contraband. I called on the State Department to verify it. They could not do it. They had no such notice, and they cabled Berlin for information, and the reply was that the statement was false. Yet there is a class of newspaper men who pick up anything they can to start and circulate it in the effort to justify the illegal conduct of Great Britain. It is not patriotic to be hunting for an opportunity to strike the commerce of your own country, and I am not proud of the men who do it.

DECLARATION OF LONDON.

The declaration of London covering the rules of international law applicable to naval warfare was signed February 26, 1909. It is gratifying to see that the press of the country is beginning to recognize the great value of the declaration of London as an authority upon the rules of naval warfare.

Still it is worth repeating that this declaration was prepared by the representatives of the 10 great naval powers of the world. They were called together at the instance of Great Britain to consider and, if possible, agree as to what were the correct rules of international law applicable to those branches of naval warfare submitted to them.

There were 40 delegates present chosen from England, France, Germany, Austria, Russia, Japan, Italy, Spain, the Netherlands, and the United States. Among their number were authors of distinction, naval officers who had made a specialty of the rules of international law applicable to naval warfare, professors of international law from great universities, and the counsellors of the state department of Great Britain.

The rules of international law which they announced were unanimously agreed to by them.

These rules classified contraband as "absolute" and "conditional" contraband.

They make a list of those commodities which by the customs of nations, on account of their general use for peaceful purposes, no nation is authorized to make contraband. They declare that the "free list" which they present can not be made contraband by any belligerent, and this free list is headed with "raw cotton."

BRITISH SUPPORTED CLASSIFICATION OF COTTON ON FREE LIST.

The British representatives to this conference, in a letter to their Government with reference to contraband, reported on March 30, 1909:

> We * * * have secured the addition of a free list which will place it beyond the power of belligerents in the future to treat as contraband the raw material of some of the most important of our national industries.

When the declaration of London was considered by the House of Commons during the year 1911, the representatives of the Government prided themselves upon the fact that the London conference had placed cotton upon the free list, thereby preventing any belligerent in the future from ever treating cotton in any way as contraband. The opposition to the Government ridiculed the claim that this was valuable, because they insisted cotton was already established upon the free list by the recognized customs of nations.

Upon this subject Mr. Balfour said:

> They pride themselves on having prevented cotton and wool and other things from being made contraband of war, and so far as I can make out only because one nation, again ineffectively and for a very brief time, said that cotton might be regarded as conditional contraband.

And Mr. Cave, one of the able lawyers of the House of Commons, in support of his contention that no nation could make cotton contraband, said:

> A thing can not be made contraband unless it is declared contraband by the belligerent power and the claim is accepted by the neutral power. After all, treating a thing as contraband is taking away property—goods and possibly the ship—of other nations with which you have no quarrel at all, and in order to establish that you must have the assent of that nation to the transaction as a whole. Neutral nations agree to form a kind of ring around the two parties who are at war and not to assist either by sending goods which will help them in their warlike operations. The mere fact that one of the two nations says, "These goods assist my enemy in his operations," does not make those goods contraband. It is always a subject of controversy between neutrals and belligerent nations as to whether the neutrals will accept a declaration of contraband.

Great Britain has by a municipal regulation sought to make cotton absolute contraband.

The order making cotton absolute contraband was not only in violation of the customs of nations but in violation of the protest of Great Britain to Russia when Russia made cotton contraband in 1904.

It disregarded the provision of the declaration of London, which only permitted a belligerent to make absolute contraband goods which could be used alone for military purposes.

This provision of the declaration of London followed the instructions from the British Government to her delegates to this conference, which advised them that it must be conceded under rules of international law that no belligerent could make anything absolute contraband which could be used for other than military purposes.

We may well protest the legality of the order of August 21, 1915, by the privy council of Great Britain making cotton absolute contraband.

It is the greatest export commodity produced in the United States. In the past century we have sold the export of cotton for $16,750,000,000. It is now, with its legitimate markets open and including cotton seed, a crop worth $1,000,000,000 a year. It furnishes employment in its culture and its manufacture to more people in the United States than any other commodity. We have no national asset of greater value.

ORDER HAS NOT SO FAR HURT COTTON.

It is true that the passage of the order making cotton absolute contraband last August did not of itself interfere with cotton shipments, but this was only because already, by the illegal orders of the privy council of Great Britain of March 1 and 11, 1915, the neutral ports of northern Europe had been blockaded.

All the commerce of citizens of the United States was, by these blockade orders of March 1 and 11, shut out from Germany and Austria, so that an order in August making cotton absolute contraband did not itself shut cotton out of Germany and Austria. It had already been shut out months before by the illegal blockade orders.

ANIMUS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

In this connection I call attention to the report of Consul General Robert P. Skinner, of London, which, on page 1055, reads as follows:

> It continues to be the case that many classes of goods, the exportation of which from the United States to neutral countries is attended with great difficulty and hazard, are going forward freely from Great Britain to the same countries, and in some cases in largely increased quantities. * * * Exports of cotton, as reported under the cotton statistics act of 1868, were as follows up to August 5, 1915:

	American bales.
To August 5, 1915	220,847
To July 30, 1914	106,382

During the months of March and August, 1915, inclusive, Great Britain, while seizing cargoes of cotton belonging to citizens of the United States and taking them into British ports, there to be sold, permitted her own citizens to ship 95,000 bales of cotton to Holland and Sweden alone, although the year previous they shipped only 6,200 bales during the same period.

Interference with shipments by citizens of the United States was lawless. The purpose of the interference is shown when citizens of Great Britain are permitted to ship American cotton to these points from which American citizens were excluded.

Sir Edward Grey and the British ambassador have sought to excuse this misconduct by pointing to increased shipments by American citizens to neutral countries of northern Europe during the year 1915. These shipments were made principally in January and February. They were not made after the British blockade was put into effect.

During the month of February, 1915, citizens of the United States shipped cotton to Holland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and Germany to the amount of 450,000 bales.

The shipments in March, 1915, were seized and carried into British ports.

Shipments for April last dropped to 45,000 bales. Few of these reached their destination.

Shipments for May and June dropped to 25,000 bales, and finally efforts to ship cotton were practically abandoned.

There was a demand for a million bales of cotton owned by citizens of the United States in these countries from March to July. The illegal conduct of Great Britain cut off this market for the 1914 crop and cut off a market for 3,000,000 bales of the 1915 crop.

HISTORY OF COTTON SHIPMENTS SINCE WAR BEGAN.

There has been a continuous assault made upon the American cotton product in Great Britain since the war began.

During the fall of 1914 constant reports were circulated, apparently by authority in London, that cotton was about to be made contraband.

British marine insurance companies declined to insure cotton sailing to the ports of northern Europe.

The ports of Germany were not blockaded, and yet no cotton sailed to them. Practically no cotton sailed to Norway, Sweden, Denmark, or Holland.

The price of cotton in the United States fell to 6 cents a pound and less, while cotton in Germany was reported to be selling at over 20 cents a pound.

Finally, a resolution was introduced in the Senate on October 22, 1914, providing for the appointment of a committee which should seek through the State Department a formal declaration from the British Government avowing its purposes with reference to cotton.

On the 26th of October, 1914, Sir Cecil Spring-Rice wrote Mr. Lansing, then Acting Secretary of State, as follows:

Last night I received a reply from Sir Edward Grey, in which he authorizes me to give the assurance that cotton will not be seized. He points out that cotton has not been put in any of our lists of contraband, and, as your department must be aware from the draft proclamation now in your possession, it is not proposed to include it in our new list of contraband. It is, therefore, as far as Great Britain is concerned, in the free list, and will remain there.

Mr. GALLINGER. What was the date of that answer, I will ask the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was October 26, 1914. The absolute promise from the British Government less than two years ago in connection with this war, when possibly they did not know that Germany no longer needed cotton to make powder, was "cotton is on the free list, and will remain there."

Ah, the blush of shame must come to the cheeks of great Englishmen who for the past 20 years have been the exponents of international law, who have been the great leaders in defense of the rights of neutrals. They laid down the rules so clearly that the violation by Great Britain now is apparent. Surely Great Britain, on second thought, will rejoice once more to lead as the nation devoted to law.

This statement, furnished by Great Britain October 26, 1914, was freely circulated among cotton merchants, shipowners, and institutions in a position to finance cotton shipments.

By December cotton began to sail, with a German and Austrian destination. During the months of December, January, and February those two countries absorbed two and a quarter million bales of cotton raised in the United States.

The price of cotton began to rise, and by the early spring it had reached 10 cents a pound.

Then came the seizure of cotton under the illegal orders of Great Britain, passed March 1 and 11; cotton went down 2 cents a pound.

Later on it was discovered that the crop of 1915 was nearly 6,000,000 bales less than the crop of 1914. Besides this, the farmers had raised ample foodstuffs and were prepared to hold their cotton.

The facilities for financing loans afforded by the Federal Reserve System was another valuable aid in protecting the crop from sacrifice, and in spite of the lawless conduct of Great Britain, a fair price per pound for an ordinary-sized crop was obtained by the cotton farmers.

With their markets open, in view of the very short crop, the price would have been sufficient to have enabled them to recover some of their serious losses of the previous year.

Then, another thing is affecting the production of cotton, and that is that no potash now comes in from Germany. Nearly one-half the cotton land will practically yield little or no cotton without such an application. You can not grow cotton on some land without potash.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator means that cotton can not be grown on sandy soil without potash.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. I was just going on to say that the land without potash is a sandy loam. In certain sections of our States where clay is found potash also is found, but in our sandy-loam lands the application of some potash by artificial addition is necessary. That is certainly the case in my own State, and I suppose it is so everywhere.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is true everywhere.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; and the inability to obtain potash, with the consequent reduction in the size of the crop, has helped to keep up the price of cotton. The customs of nations had freed cotton shipped by neutrals to belligerents from seizure. It had placed it upon a free list, which could not be made contraband and could not be subject to seizure.

Great Britain led in the protest when Russia undertook to make cotton contraband, and forced Russia to permit cotton to pass free.

Forty distinguished students of international law, meeting at the instance of Great Britain to codify the rules of international law applicable to naval warfare, unanimously agreed that cotton should head the list of items free from seizure by belligerents and which no belligerent could make contraband.

When the declaration of London was before the House of Commons in 1911 all members of the House of Commons who spoke upon the subject took the position that cotton could not be made contraband by a belligerent and must be permitted to pass free.

As late as October 26, 1914, the British Government assured our Government that cotton is, "as far as Great Britain is concerned, in the free list and will remain there."

Are we quietly to submit? Are we to permit the rights of the people of this country in commerce to be ruthlessly and knowingly disregarded? I come now to foodstuffs.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator from Georgia if I should ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am intensely interested in this discussion, because I believe that Great Britain has gone very far beyond her rights in one direction during the progress of this European war. I will therefore ask the Senator if the State Department of this administration holds a different view from what the Senator himself does on this subject; and, if it does not, has any earnest effort been made to correct the existing condition of things?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator from New Hampshire. I introduced my remarks by a clear, clean, intense protest against the legality of the course of Great Britain made by the administration. The letter of March 30 is strong and emphatic. Again, the letter of October asserts our rights in the plainest and most forcible way. The position already taken by the State Department is in entire accord with every view of the law which I have presented. I am simply seeking before the Senate and the country to support those declarations of our legal right in a more elaborate way than a state paper could properly do.

FOODSTUFFS.

I wish now to bring to the attention of the Senate the illegal manner in which Great Britain has treated the commerce of neutrals in foodstuffs during the present war.

Foodstuffs have been classified uniformly as conditional contraband. Under this classification they could only be seized by a belligerent, according to the view of most nations, when they were sailing to a port of an enemy, and when the proof showed that they were there to be used by the armed forces of the enemy. If the proof failed to show that the foodstuffs were not to be used by noncombatants, then the foodstuffs had the right, shipped by neutrals, to enter a belligerent country, and no opposing belligerent had the right to seize them.

Great Britain has been seizing foodstuffs since the winter of 1914, even if they were sailing to neutral ports and without any proof that they were going to a belligerent country for the use of the military or naval forces of the opposing belligerent.

Millions of dollars of goods belonging to citizens of the United States have been ordered confiscated by the prize courts of Great Britain, when the goods were shipped to Sweden and to other neutral countries, with no proof presented that they were going to the military or naval forces of Germany or Austria or of any belligerent opposing Great Britain.

This conduct of Great Britain was used by Germany as a pretext for the submarine warfare, which was declared to be a retaliatory measure.

In February the United States addressed letters to each of the Governments urging that each withdraw from the respective lines of conduct just mentioned. Germany practically agreed to accept the proposition and Great Britain refused.

ILLEGAL ORDER OF PRIVY COUNCIL.

I have no doubt that the basis for the decision of the English prize courts is found in the order of the British privy council of October 29, 1914, which directs the following modification of the declaration of London:

PAR. 3. Notwithstanding the provisions of article 35 of the declaration of London, conditional contraband shall be liable to capture on board a vessel bound for a neutral port if the goods are consigned to order, or if the ship's papers do not show who is the consignee of the goods, or if they show a consignee of the goods in territory belonging to or occupied by the enemy.

PAR. 4. In cases covered by the preceding paragraph it shall lie upon the owners of the goods to prove that their destination was innocent.

Paragraph 35 of the declaration of London provides:

Conditional contraband is not liable to capture except when found on board a vessel bound for territory belonging to or occupied by the enemy, or for the armed forces of the enemy, when it is not to be discharged in an intervening neutral port.

This provision in the declaration of London was unquestionably a correct statement of the recognized rule of international law.

The British orders just quoted directed the naval forces of that country and the prize courts of that country to abandon the rules of international law which distinguished absolute from conditional contraband.

Under the rules of international law foodstuffs could not be seized when sailing upon a vessel bound to a neutral port. By this order England determined to seize them, though sailing to a neutral port.

According to the rules of international law, a neutral could ship foodstuffs to Germany or Austria, unless it was proven to be going for the use of the military or naval forces of Germany or Austria. By this order Great Britain directed that foodstuffs should be seized if going through a neutral port consigned to private citizens in Germany or Austria. If the foodstuffs were going at all into Germany or Austria, Great Britain directed their seizure.

According to the rules of international law, the burden was upon the belligerent seizing foodstuffs to prove that they were to be used by the army or navy of the opposing belligerent.

By this order Great Britain directed foodstuffs seized and confiscated when shipped to a neutral port if consigned to order, or to consignees in Germany, or if the ship's papers did not show who was the consignee of the goods, and also required the owners of the goods to prove that their destination was innocent.

It was a clear case of action by the privy council of Great Britain, which has authority to legislate upon this subject for that Government alone, setting up an illegal regulation to be enforced against the citizens of other nationalities in utter disregard of their rights under the rules of international law.

GREAT BRITAIN CONDEMNED BY HER OWN PRECEDENTS.

Again, I will rely upon English authority to show the lawlessness of this course pursued for more than 12 months past and still pursued by Great Britain.

In 1885 the French Government announced its intention of treating rice as contraband when destined to Chinese ports north of Canton.

Lord Granville, British foreign secretary, declared that the—British Government could not admit that provisions could be treated as contraband of war merely because they were consigned to a belligerent port. The British Government—did not deny that provisions might acquire a contraband character under particular circumstances, as if they should be consigned directly to the fleet of a belligerent or to a port where such fleet was lying, but that there must, in any event, be circumstances relative to any particular cargo, or its destination, to displace the presumption that articles of this kind are intended for the ordinary use of life, and to show prima facie, at all events, that they are destined for military use, before they could be treated as contraband.

Said his lordship—

Lord Granville further stated:

His Majesty's Government feel themselves bound to reserve their right of protest at once against the doctrine that it is for the belligerent to decide what is and what is not contraband of war, regardless of the well-established rights of neutrals.

Lord Salisbury thus defined the position of His Majesty's Government on the question of foodstuffs:

Foodstuffs, with a hostile destination, can be considered contraband of war only if they are supplies for the enemy's forces. It is not sufficient that they are capable of being so used; it must be shown that this was in fact their destination at the time of the seizure.

When the Russian Government undertook during the Russo-Japanese war to treat foodstuffs as contraband, Lord Lansdowne protested that His Majesty's Government observed "with great concern that rice and provisions will be treated as unconditionally contraband, a step which they regard as inconsistent with the law and practice of nations. His Majesty's Government," said Lord Lansdowne, did not contest "that, in particular circumstances, provisions may acquire a contraband character, as, for instance, if they should be consigned direct to the army or fleet of a belligerent, or to a port where such fleet may be lying"; but that His Majesty's Government could not admit "that if such provisions were consigned to the port of a belligerent (even though it should be a port of naval equipment) they should therefore be necessarily regarded as contraband of war."

BRITISH STATESMEN SHOW FOODSTUFF SHOULD GO THROUGH NEUTRAL PORTS TO GERMANY.

During the debate in the House of Commons growing out of the action of Russia, Mr. Bryce, Sir Charles Dilke, and Mr. A. J. Balfour, spoke as follows:

Mr. BRYCE. Food, by the general consent of nations, was not contraband of war unless it could be clearly proved to be intended for military or naval purposes. As one well-known authority had declared, it was unjustifiable so to treat it merely because of some uncertainty as to its ultimate destination.

Sir CHARLES DILKE. As regarded the attempt of Russia to treat food and raw material under all circumstances as contraband of war simply because they were destined for Japan, that was impossible for this country to accept.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR. I must express on my own behalf a general concurrence with the views on international law expressed by all of the honorable gentlemen who have spoken.

The Russian Government yielded.

ROYAL ENGLISH COMMISSION ON FOODSTUFFS.

The English Government appointed a royal commission in 1904 to consider the question of supply of food and raw material for Great Britain in time of war.

This commission consisted of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and 20 other leading English statesmen.

Among other things, their report contained the following statements:

As regards foodstuffs, the rule of the British and United States prize courts is that which was most fully expounded by Lord Stowell in the case of the Jonge Margaretha. "I take," he said, "the modern established rule to be this, that generally they (provisions) are not contraband, but may become so under circumstances arising out of the particular situation of the war. * * * The most important distinction is whether the articles were intended for the ordinary use of life or even for mercantile ships' use or whether they were going with a highly probable destination to military use." Prof. Holland states as follows the rule which, in his opinion, has all but won its way to universal acceptance:

"Provisions in neutral ships may be intercepted by a belligerent as contraband only when, being suitable for the purpose, they are on their way to a port of naval or military equipment belonging to the enemy, or occupied by the enemy's naval or military forces, or to the enemy's ships at sea, or when they are destined for the relief of a port besieged by such belligerent."

It is, however, necessary to call attention to action taken by two powers on recent occasions not in accordance with the rule as thus stated. France in 1885 announced her intention of treating rice as contraband in her war with China, on the ground of its importance as food of the Chinese people and army, conduct the more remarkable because during the whole history of international law France had been distinguished by her refusal to admit the contraband character of provisions under any circumstances. The British Government protested, but, owing to the rapid termination of the war, the controversy was carried no further.

Russia, as has been already mentioned, at the commencement of the present war went so far as to include foodstuffs in her list of absolutely contraband articles, mentioning specifically "rice, all kinds of grain, fish, fish products, beans, bean oil, and oil cake." She has, however, receded from this position in consequence of strongly expressed protests from several of the powers, Great Britain and the United States in particular, and, in accordance with the advice of a commission presided over by Prof. de Martens, has undertaken that these articles will henceforth be regarded only as conditionally contraband, according to the use to which they are to be applied.

Lord Lansdowne's dispatch of June 1, 1904, stated that "His Majesty's Government observe with great concern that rice and provisions will be treated as unconditionally contraband, a step which they regard as inconsistent with the law and practice of nations." Mr. Hay's note of August 30, with reference to the judgment of Vladivostok prize court, confiscating as contraband the cargo of the Arabia, consisting of railway material and flour consigned to private commercial houses in Japan, spoke of that judgment as "rendered in disregard of the settled law of nations in respect of what constitutes contraband of war." He proceeds to state as "a substantive principle of the law of nations" that "articles which, like arms and ammunition, are by their nature of self-evident warlike use, are contraband if destined for the enemy's territory, but articles which, like coal, cotton, and provisions, though of ordinarily innocent, are capable of warlike use, are not subject to capture and confiscation unless shown by evidence to be actually destined for the military or naval forces of a belligerent. The Russian claim," he adds, "obviates the necessity of blockade, renders meaningless the principles of the declaration of Paris that a blockade to be binding must be effective, obliterates all distinction between contraband and non-contraband goods, and is in effect a declaration of war against commerce of every description between the people of a neutral and those of a belligerent State."

The interest of neutral nations in the maintenance of international law (especially if the nation interested is strong enough to enforce its views) affords a further and increasingly potent guaranty of its being duly observed. It is, for instance, hardly to be expected that a neutral nation, if able to resent it, would tolerate the seizure as contraband of goods which had previously been recognized by international law as innocent. It should be remembered also that the nation which we should have the greatest reason to hope would be neutral, were Great Britain engaged in war, the United States of America, is also that which, in such a case, would be most interested in maintaining those neutral rights of which it has ever been the foremost advocate.

So it will be seen that Great Britain did not permit Russia to treat foodstuffs as subject to seizure simply because they were sailing to Japan when Russia was at war with Japan. They required Russia to show affirmatively that the particular foodstuffs were to be used by the army and navy of Japan, and not by the noncombatant population of Japan.

This could not be proved except in the rarest cases, so foodstuffs went to Japan, as Russia yielded to the British contention.

The United States took exactly the same position, and Russia also yielded to the view of the United States Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to inquire whether or not, if the embargo were relieved as to foodstuffs, the Senator believes there would be any risk or danger in allowing foodstuffs to pass, arising from the possibility of including in such cargoes material that might be used for military purposes?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is a possibility. If it took place and the vessel were caught, the vessel and the cargo would be forfeited. If, in point of fact, they undertook to hide in a vessel sailing from the United States real contraband of war and they were caught, they would forfeit the ship and forfeit the goods. They would all be confiscated. That is the restriction against such reckless conduct.

I should be glad to have our inspectors at the ports see what is in the vessels and see that the manifest is true and publish it at once to the world. Give us our rights, nothing more; and give us our rights with an open hand. This would stop the possible illegal shipments suggested.

The House of Commons in 1911 had under consideration the declaration of London. The Government was urging its adoption. The opposition to the Government was opposing it.

The fight made upon the declaration by the opposition to the Government was principally because foodstuffs had not been put upon the free list where no belligerent could ever make them contraband of any character.

Mr. McKinnon Wood was undersecretary of state in charge of the debate for the Government. I will give a number of interesting expressions during that debate from members of Parliament, now leaders in Great Britain, which show how utterly Great Britain is disregarding the rights of neutrals and how fully these British leaders know that the rights of neutrals in the treatment of foodstuffs are being disregarded.

Mr. McKINNON WOOD. * * * We tried at the peace conference to have food placed on the free list. We could not secure an approach to international agreement. The declaration of London places it on the list, in accordance with the old-established British doctrine—or, at any rate, our doctrine for a long time now. * * *

Mr. McKENNA. * * * He admits, and I admit with him, that in general practice food has only been conditional contraband, the condition depending upon whether it was intended for the armed forces of the enemy. * * * The declaration of London declares that food may become contraband under precisely these conditions. * * *

Sir EDWARD GREY. * * * If food is to be declared absolute contraband, so that all food coming to any commercial port is to be stopped by a belligerent, the belligerent can only do that by driving a coach and four through what is the plain meaning of the declaration of London.

It will be observed that Mr. McKinnon Wood had stated that the provision of the declaration of London was in accordance with the old-established British doctrine—that is to say, the rule of international law—with reference to foodstuffs long recognized by Great Britain.

Sir Edward Grey, therefore, declares that a belligerent could only stop all food going to a commercial port by driving a "coach and four" through the plain meaning of "the old-established British doctrine."

Mr. BALFOUR. * * * There are great continental countries which habitually import such corn as they require through neutral ports. They can not be touched under this declaration. * * * The old practice and the old theory were that it was only when corn was actually being obviously imported for the use of soldiers or ports of equipment or the use of fortresses that then, and then only, we had any right to treat it as contraband. * * *

It will be observed that Mr. Balfour declared that under the old theory—that is to say, the established rules of international law—corn (foodstuffs) could only be treated as contraband—that is to say, seized by a belligerent—when it was being imported for the use of soldiers or ports of equipment or a fortress.

Great Britain has seized foodstuffs belonging to citizens of the United States and has confiscated them simply because it was claimed that they were going to Germany. Not that they were going for the use of the soldiers, but because they were going to Germany, even though they were to be used by the noncombatant population of Germany.

Mr. Balfour is to-day secretary of the navy of Great Britain.

Mr. BONAR LAW. They have to prove, as we have to prove, that food is destined for the armed forces of the other side.

Mr. Bonar Law is one of the leading statesmen of Great Britain, and he declares that food can only be stopped when Great Britain proves that it is destined for the armed forces of Germany.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. And in contravention of that rule, if I read the matter correctly, Great Britain has placed an embargo upon the exportation of milk to the babies of Germany at the present time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Absolutely.

Mr. GALLINGER. They must be noncombatants.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Unquestionably. The truth is, Senators, we all know that Germany has provided her army with all the foodstuffs it needs. The resources of that country are ample for the army, and everybody knows the army will be cared for first. This interference with foodstuffs does not touch the army.

Great Britain is seizing foodstuffs simply because it is going to Germany, and seizes it going to a neutral port, unless the neutral citizen owning it can prove that it is not going to Germany.

During the debate in Commons in 1911 the following statements were made:

Mr. ATHERLY JONES. What is the law, and let the right honorable gentleman, the undersecretary, correct me if I am not stating the law aright. When I speak of law, it has no sanction except that of usage. It is a mere custom of law, but it has very powerful sanction. It has this powerful sanction that the common sense of Europe has justified the law, and justified it so far that it has never, except in one or two extravagant cases, been violated. The law is that foodstuffs, unless carried to a port of naval or military equipment, can not be seized—I mean foodstuffs in neutral vessels. That is absolutely unequivocal, and I think unanimously recognized to be the law of Europe.

Mr. Atherly Jones is one of the most distinguished law writers in Great Britain. He declares that foodstuffs can not be seized unless being carried to a port of naval or military equipment of Germany.

Mr. BUTCHER. I think my honorable friend who has spoken has laid down the law with absolute clearness when he said that the general modern practice of nations for a hundred years has been to treat food not as contraband, liable to seizure in any circumstance, but as conditional contraband, liable to seizure only when it is proved to be intended for the armed force of the enemy. We have the opinion of one undersecretary to-night; let me read the opinion of another Liberal undersecretary for foreign affairs, a man whose authority as a jurist and a statesman none of us would dispute. I refer to the Right Hon. James Bryce. He said, from his place in this House, on August 11, 1904:

"Food, by the general consent of the nations, was not contraband unless it was clearly proved to be intended for military or naval purposes."

Does the right honorable gentleman dispute the accuracy of the statement of Mr. Bryce? It has gone unchallenged in the House of Commons until to-day, and not a single jurist or anyone else has challenged it until it was challenged by the undersecretary this afternoon.

Mr. Butcher is a distinguished English statesman and law writer. He indorses the view of Viscount James Bryce that food could only be seized when clearly proved to be intended for military or naval purposes.

Mr. SHIRLEY BENN. One case in which a country tried to starve another country into submission was our own case, in 1795, when that celebrated order in council was issued instructing British cruisers to capture all vessels going into any French port that had food supplies on board. Our captains captured some, but what was the result? The United States complained that it was not legal, and the matter was left to a mixed commission, and that commission decided that it was not legal, and England had to pay not only for the value of the goods but also for the loss of market and detention. The second case was the one referred to in the House this afternoon, when France, in her war with China, declared that any rice going to any port north of Canton should be considered as contraband. What was the result? Lord Granville, the Liberal foreign minister, promptly issued a proclamation to the effect that no decision of a prize court carrying out such a doctrine would be recognized by England, and the result was that it was not carried out.

Mr. Shirley Benn, another prominent English statesman, not only agrees with those to whom I have already referred, but he further concedes the fact that, when in 1795 British cruisers seized a vessel of the United States carrying foodstuffs, solely because it was going into a French port, France being then engaged in war with Great Britain, the case was left to a mixed commission, and this commission decided that the seizure was illegal, and England not only had to pay the value of the goods, but for the loss of market and detention.

I wish, however, to read a few extracts from one of the speeches made on the floor of Parliament in 1911. It is from Sir Robert Finlay. After showing that foodstuffs could go to a neutral nation without molestation and that they could go to a belligerent port without molestation unless they were shown to be intended for the army or navy of the belligerent, he then concludes in this way. Just listen——

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. COLT. I have listened with great interest to the argument of the Senator from Georgia, and I should like to ask him whether he does not think that, as the rules of municipal law are suspended in time of war, so the rules of international law are in part suspended by a belligerent in time of war; that a nation at war is in a fever or delirium where so-called rules of law, which may be made in times of peace, seem of comparatively little consequence compared with the great issue of preserving the national life; and hence that belligerents will seize upon any ambiguity in an international rule or upon any forced construction in order that they may in fact suspend the rule; and that the great defect in international law is that nations at war will not obey rules of conduct agreed to in times of peace?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President and Senators, nations, like men, are likely to be lawless if they see no danger to themselves from being lawless. Nations in times of war may be disposed to disregard law if there is no power to call them and make them regard it. But we saw in the Russo-Japanese War the power of Great Britain to call Russia when she desired by a municipal regulation to set aside international law. Russia was called, and she came back to the law. And so it may be to-day that the lawless in Great Britain have intimidated the believers in law and persuaded them to issue these illegal municipal regulations. It needs but the power of the United States, as the great neutral, to assert the rights of neutrals, and we will find the great statesmen of England glad to come back in the conduct of English affairs to the recognition of those rules of international law that they have contributed so much to create.

Now, let me read to you, from an English statesman, his opinion of what Great Britain could rely upon. I want the Senator from Rhode Island to hear what the English statesman thought Great Britain could rely upon to see that the rules of international law were enforced if Great Britain was at war. It had been suggested that while the rules of international law gave the privilege of these shipments of raw materials and foodstuffs, some other belligerent might wish to violate them. Now, let me show you where Great Britain put her reliance that the rules of international law would be enforced that would give her the supplies she needed. I read from Sir Robert Finlay, near the close of the debate upon the declaration of London in 1909:

Sir R. FINLAY. The law of conditional contraband is perfectly clear. It has always been held in this country, it has always been held in the United States, and it has been laid down authoritatively that food is contraband only if it is for the army or the fleet, and is in consequence of that part of naval or military equipment. A very able writer on international law, Mr. Hall, says the opposite view is not arguable, and a right honorable gentleman of considerable authority in these matters to whom honorable gentlemen on the other side might be disposed to listen, Mr. Bryce, our ambassador at Washington, expressed himself on this subject on the 11th of August, 1904, in a debate in the house in these terms:

"Food, by the general consent of nations, was not contraband of war unless it is clearly proved to be for military or naval purposes. In 1885 an attempt was made by France to treat rice as contraband of war. Lord Granville protested in the most energetic manner, and in point of fact rice never was treated as contraband of war."

That authority is one which, I think, is amply borne out by a more extended view of the law on this point, into which on this occasion I do not intend, of course, to enter.

Will any honorable gentleman say that any power at war with us would be likely to provoke the displeasure of the United States by declaring that corn carried in a United States vessel to this country should be absolute contraband of war? Not only is the law on the matter clear, but it has behind it, so far as we are concerned, a sanction of the most effective kind, for happily, I think, we may dismiss the very idea of the possibility of war between this country and the United States as not within the range of practical politics, and as long as we are not at war with the United States we may depend upon it that no country, however powerful, would incur the displeasure and the possible hostility of such a power as the United States by putting forward an unfounded claim to treat food brought to this country as contraband of war.

This exposition by Sir R. Finlay needs little comment. He told the British Parliament, in 1911, that no country, however powerful, would incur the displeasure, and possible hostility, of such a power as the United States by putting forward an unfounded claim to treat food brought to Great Britain as contraband of war.

I wonder what he thinks of the United States now, when we submit not only to the seizure of vessels destined to German ports carrying foodstuffs, but to the seizure of vessels destined to neutral ports of Holland and Sweden and permit Great Britain, disregarding rules of international law, by orders from the privy council, which must be followed by her prize courts, to confiscate cargoes of foodstuffs belonging to citizens of the United States with no proof whatever that they were intended for the military or naval forces of Germany?

Germany and Austria have a population of over 110,000,000 people. It is estimated that perhaps 10 per cent of these are under arms. Certainly over 90,000,000 people in these two countries are noncombatants.

By every rule of international law citizens of the United States have the right to ship to these noncombatants for their use, through the neutral ports of northern Europe, all the foodstuffs they wish to buy. The same is equally true of raw cotton.

Raw cotton is the great commodity used to clothe the world. So that Great Britain is suppressing the shipment of foodstuffs and clothing to the noncombatant population of her enemy, in utter defiance of established rules of international law, in utter defiance of rules which all of her present statesmen have within the past five years declared to be the correct rules of international law, and rules which they insist Great Britain, in case of war, could safely rely upon, because the United States would not permit them to be broken.

Only a partial knowledge of German and Austrian resources will convince all that these countries have ample internal resources to produce foodstuffs and clothing to fully supply the men under arms.

They will also supply the noncombatants to an extent which may bring pinches from want, but will not destroy. To this there may be one exception—young children may die for lack of milk.

Great Britain can not hope to accomplish anything so far as the immediate effect of the war is concerned by this lawlessness. We may find a reason for their course so far as cotton is concerned. The manufacture and exportation of cotton fabrics has been a great industry in Germany. The marvelous skill of these people as mechanics, their superiority as chemists have made markets in the world for their manufactured products which have seriously encroached upon English commerce.

If cotton can be kept out of Germany and the exports from Germany suppressed, then perhaps England may capture this trade and help her own commerce.

PRESIDENT LONDON BOARD OF TRADE DEFINES POSITION.

The frankness with which the president of the London Board of Trade, in a speech before the House of Commons on January 9, proclaimed the purposes of Great Britain almost staggers comprehension.

Let me give a few extracts. He declared that—

England will assault Germany's trade now and after the war. * * * We must keep control of the world's coal; we must secure control of the supply of oil. While the war is on we must do everything in our power to destroy German finance, credit, and trade * * * so that after the war Germany does not have the opportunity of reorganizing her commercial system before our trade has begun to flow in ever-increasing volume. * * * We must make it clear, however, that when peace comes we will not permit the outbreak of the economic war which Germany would wage against ourself and our allies. * * * It has been all along the policy of the board of trade to capture German trade while the war is still on. In the case of South America, we have since the war began developed a trade which, I hope, will continue long after the cessation of hostilities.

In the course of the debate there were some references to the danger of competition with the United States, to which John Halford Mackinder replied:

The member has spoken of America as a dangerous commercial rival, but I can not conceive of that competition taking the complex, scientific, and destructive form of Germany's competition.

On the day following this speech cable reports advised us that—

Insertion of a clause in the peace agreement binding Germany to refrain from all export business for a period of years is one of the methods suggested by British trade experts to cripple German trade after the war. Leading London business men generally approved the statement made by President Walter Runciman, of the board of trade, in commons last night that Great Britain must so cripple German commerce that the Germans can not again dispute world supremacy with the British nation.

The commercial rights of citizens of the United States and of other neutrals are being recklessly disregarded by Great Britain. They are being disregarded in part to destroy Germany commercially and in part to advance the trade of Great Britain.

Shall we quietly continue to furnish Great Britain what she is compelled to obtain from the United States while the commercial rights of citizens of this country are trampled under foot?

Great Britain can not continue the war without munitions from the United States.

Great Britain can not feed her population without foodstuffs from the United States and other neutrals.

Great Britain can not keep her million and a half people engaged in the Lancashire mills at work 60 days without cotton from the United States.

Great Britain can not accomplish her scheme for world-wide domination of commerce in her vast products of cotton-manufactured fabrics without cotton from the United States.

The administration has forcefully brought to the attention of Great Britain the rights of citizens of this country.

It has been demonstrated that citizens of neutral countries have the right to ship foodstuffs and cotton in unlimited quantities through the neutral ports of northern Europe to the noncombatant inhabitants of Germany and Austria.

The Congress of the United States slept over the right of shippers of foodstuffs last winter. This was perhaps because the prices were good, perhaps because we did not investigate the subject.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator think that Great Britain, of course, realizing that she can not carry on her war without munitions from the United States, and foodstuffs, and so forth, also understands that the United States will not forego the business opportunity of supplying those things to Great Britain, and that therefore she does not feel uneasy about the situation?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. She may think that is true, and she may think that these influences are so great that the United States would not, but she knows that we could do without shipments for 60 or 90 days, and she can not. She knows that we would be suspending profits while she would be going to absolute ruin. One word further, she knows that we are right and that she is wrong.

Mr. BORAH. But she understands, of course, that she is fighting for her existence and that we are unwilling to deny ourselves the opportunity which that situation presents.

I am delighted to hear the Senator's argument, but it is a practical question. Does the Senator believe that by any possibility we could pass through the Congress of the United States an inhibition against or an embargo upon the shipment of those things which Great Britain needs?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If I could have the support of the able Senator from Idaho, I would be glad to join him in passing such a provision—to go into effect in 30 days, unless Great Britain in the meantime receded from her orders in council and recognized our rights of international law.

Mr. BORAH. That would make two.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Here is another.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. With the support of the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Arkansas we could well hope for the balance.

Mr. BORAH. I think I can, in the Senate, count five or six.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can count a good many more than that on this side.

Mr. BORAH. Then let us get to business; decide what it is wise and just to do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then let the Senator from Idaho give me one of his splendid speeches in support of this policy and we will go hand and shoulder together. I am simply presenting suggestions for the thought of the Senate now. I am seeking to lay the rights of our countrymen and the power of our country before you, and if the Senator from Idaho is ready to join I am more encouraged by that fact than by anything I have heard.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I manifested my disposition as to the shipment of munitions of war last year when the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] introduced his resolution. I will say to the Senator that I am perfectly willing, as a Senator, to take action both with reference to protecting our rights upon the sea and upon the land, on the ocean and in Mexico. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to assume the responsibility not of speech but of action. I have but one guide in these matters—the interests, rights, and safety of Americans. I am neither anti-English nor anti-German. Wherever American rights are invaded, American property destroyed, or American lives sacrificed, I am willing to proceed to action along any wise and effective line which will insure a recognition or respect of those rights and protection to the lives of our people. I realize that such things require reflection, but I have reflected and I am willing to vote upon effective measures now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I can not say how gratified I am to hear the expression of the Senator from Idaho. I had not heard it from him before, but I am not surprised. It is what I would expect from him, with my estimate of him as a man and a Senator.

The lawlessness of Great Britain has increased greatly during the past 12 months. Each day brings new evidence of disregard for neutral rights.

By firmness, but peacefully, neutrals can easily obtain their rights from both belligerents.

Paraphrasing the language of Mr. Jefferson, England may feel the desire of absorbing the commerce of Germany and of starving her people, but she can have no right of doing it at our loss or of making us the instrument of it.

Mr. President, I am in favor of enforcing our rights against all the belligerent nations. I am in favor of action by Congress which will let the belligerents understand that unless our rights are promptly regarded we will act, and such knowledge in London as the expressions of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] going to London will help those men in London who believe in the law. They will help bring a rescision from the illegal orders in council, for when they know that we are in earnest they must stop and think, and then return to the principles which they have so long advocated, and which they must find no pleasure to set aside.

ABSCHRIFT CENTRALSTELLE FUR WISSENSCHAFTLICH-TECHNISCHE UNTERSUCHUNGEN, G. M. B. H.,
Neubabelsberg, den 3. Dez. 1915.

HOWARD W. BIBLE, Esq.,
Hotel Adlon, Berlin.

SIR: An interesting chapter in the history of chemical industry will be the account of the technical achievements which have been produced during this great war.

Ever since the chemist Leblanc under the pressure of the continental blockade effected the manufacture of soda from cooking salt in France, the problem has often been solved in Germany of also making her independent of other countries by the manufacture of hitherto indispensable foreign products from native raw materials. Never, however, has the great creative power of chemical research been so in evidence as in the course of this war in which the enemies of the central powers aim to conquer them by cutting off their supply of imported raw materials. Such materials which we used to import by sea in time of peace we now manufacture from the air surrounding us, from the water, and our native soil to an extent that makes us absolutely independent of other countries. Problems, the solution of which still seemed an impossibility only a few years ago, such as the manufacture of nitrogen products from the air, have matured to accomplished facts in the chemist's laboratory.

Therefore it seems astonishing that even learned scientists of foreign countries who are regarded as experts in the field of chemical research consider problems which we have long since solved as impossible of solution. Thus it is surprising when the opinion is expressed among well-known chemists in England that to shut off her supply of cotton could destroy Germany's defensive power, even force her to conclude peace within a few months because the lack of cotton would make the manufacture of the required amount of gunpowder impossible, and thus put us at the mercy of our enemies who were not hampered by such restrictions. (Ramsay, Times, Dec. 8, 1915: "Stop cotton and we should stop the war.")

Is that really the opinion of this scientist? Does he not know what every expert in explosives should know, that cotton cellulose, as used in the manufacture of ammunition, can in every respect be replaced by wood cellulose, an unlimited supply of which is always on hand in Germany? In time of peace Mr. Ramsay had ample opportunity to become acquainted with a large part of the German chemical industry. Does he really underestimate it so much that he does not consider it able to turn wood cellulose into a form in which it can be used instead of cotton for the manufacture of gunpowder?

It is true that a much more extensive cleaning of wood cellulose is necessary, if the existing machinery is to be used, and no time lost nor any more nitric acid consumed. It was necessary to give the manufacturers of cellulose some instruction in regard to the chemical and physical requirements of the product. But the fulfillment of these requirements presented no difficulty. The manufacture of nitrocellulose from wood fiber and its conversion into gunpowder, which is absolutely on a par with that made from cotton in respect of its durability and its ballistic properties, had long been solved in all its details in our laboratories. It had only to be transferred from the laboratory to the factories, which was not difficult, thanks to the expert knowledge of the chemists in the factories. Thus wood cellulose is since considerable time being used on a vast scale by the plants in the manufacture of nitrocellulose. The need for raw cotton is no longer felt in our gunpowder industry. The capacity of our cellulose factories exceeds many times the demand for cellulose for nitrating purposes.

After the war the world will learn of many great new achievements which our chemical industry had to and was able to accomplish in order to protect our German fatherland against all the efforts of the enemy to cut off its supply of food and ammunition. Many of these products will continue after the war is over. Even in times of peace they will be valuable in making us independent of foreign raw materials.

It looks very much as if the successes achieved by the cellulose industry will be among these.

Professor at the University of Berlin;
Director of the Central Bureau for Technico-Scientific Research.

JANUARY 7, 1916.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Last October while in Washington I stated to you that during my visits to Germany, in the months of June, July, August, and September, 1915, I had been assured that cotton was no longer used in and no longer, in any sense, essential for, the manufacture of powder or explosives in Germany. As I was intending to return to Germany in November, I agreed to make a personal investigation of this subject and give you the results of that investigation. I also agreed that as soon as I reached a conclusion I would wire you, and I agreed with you upon a code to be used, in which the word "commodity" was to be substituted for the word "cotton" and the name "John Thomson" signed to the wire instead of my own. In pursuance of that agreement on December 4, 1915, after a full investigation of the subject in Germany, I sent you the following wireless message:

"Absolute evidence that commodity is not required. Substitute more effective, cheaper, and preferred for future use.

"(Signed) JOHN THOMSON."

Before sending this message I had made a most careful and unrestricted investigation of the present method of the manufacture of powder and explosives in Germany, and I satisfied myself that wood cellulose had been successfully substituted for cotton in the nitrating plants of Germany.

I reached Bremen November 28 and brought my desire for a personal investigation upon this subject at once to the attention of those largely interested in handling cotton in the Empire. I transmitted to them your request for information along the lines indicated, and they at once extended their cooperation and influence with the German Government in order that the facts might be secured.

A series of meetings were held in Bremen, and on Tuesday, December 1, President Alfred Lohman, of the Bremen Chamber of Commerce, accompanied me to Berlin for the purpose of presenting the case before the several departments of German Government, whose consent was necessary before the facts could be obtained and the necessary investigation conducted. It was arranged that I should appear before a meeting in Berlin, where the representatives of the several departments of the Government would be assembled to hear the presentation of your request that this information be furnished, and to determine whether or not it was to the interests of the German Government to comply therewith.

This meeting was held at the imperial foreign office December 3 at 5.30 p. m. It was recognized as a purely commercial matter, one involving the business interests of the United States and the German Empire, and was not regarded as an infraction of diplomatic usage.

There were present His Excellency Untarstaatssecretir Richter, Ministerial Director Muller, Geheimrat Dr. Mathies, department of interior; Ministerial Director Johannes, Geheimrat Dr. Grunewald, imperial foreign office; Rittmeister Markwald, war department; Geheimrat Dr. Stimming, finance department; Kaptain Trapp and a scientific doctor, navy department; Alfred Lohman, president of the Bremen Chamber of Commerce.

These gentlemen gave the strictest attention to the subject of our several interviews and the correspondence that passed between us relative to the unlawful restriction placed upon cotton, which I presented at considerable length, placing particular emphasis upon the value of proof that cotton was in no wise an essential element to the progress of the war as a necessity for the manufacture of explosives.

At the conclusion of my remarks I was assured by all present that cotton was no longer used or necessary in Germany for the manufacture of powder or explosives, and that the German Government would gladly extend to me every facility for securing such proof as I deemed necessary, and which might be obtained by a careful inspection of the manufacture of explosives in one or more plants operated by the Imperial Government, the selection of such plant or plants being left entirely to me. I was given an outline of where the principal powder plants were located adjacent to Berlin and authorized to select for inspection any I might prefer. I decided on the morning of December 4 to inspect the Kemiglichen Munitionsfabriken at Spandau. Accompanied by President Lohman, I reached the above plant about 10 a. m. The inspection of the various departments was at once begun, and we were accompanied in this inspection by the commanding officer of the works, Maj. Gorke, of the German Army, and Mr. von der Bocks, Koniglicher Betriebleiter der Technischen Instituten der Artillerie.

The fullest access was given to all processes of the nitrating of cotton and cellulose and a notable freedom of investigation was a feature of our visit to this plant. We first inspected the warehouses utilized for the storing of the raw material for nitrating. The first warehouse visited was entered by a railroad track with platforms on either side, and bales of wood cellulose were at the time being unloaded from freight cars. I made a careful inspection of the entire platforms on either side and found nothing there but wood cellulose and rags. Going among this stock, I directed that several bales should be opened and samples of wood cellulose were secured from the following manufacturers:

1. Altdamn—Stahlhammer (Natronzellstoff).

2. Sulphide cellulose of the cellulose manufactory, Waldhof-Mannheim.

3. Sulphide cellulose of the A. G. fur Maschinenpapier-fabrikation, Aschoffenburg.

4. Sulphide cellulose of the cellulose manufactory at Tilsit.

We then secured samples of nitrating material from rags. These samples were marked with the manufacturers' names—"Jackson" and "Breitenau." Absolutely no cotton linters were found upon this level of the warehouse and only a few bales were in evidence on the upper floor. These had been in stock for some time and were placed at one side, having been definitely rejected in favor of the use of wood cellulose and rags.

In regard to the rags, would say that all evidence pointed to their early elimination as a material for nitrating. In fact, the incoming supplies were apparently confined to wood cellulose, and there was no evidence to support a contention that dependence was being placed on rags. Leaving the warehouses, we proceeded to the buildings which were employed for the use of drying nitrocellulose and rags. The two commodities were placed in small perforated iron receptacles, which were closely packed and passed to the drying process. A careful inspection of work under way disclosed a large preponderance of wood cellulose, as compared to rags. The work in this department was entirely done by women and girls. In passing from the drying building, we entered the departments where nitrating was in progress and inspected three houses devoted exclusively to the nitrating of wood cellulose and one devoted entirely to the nitrating of rags.

In all of these houses I made a careful inspection of the tanks, causing several to be opened and obtaining therefrom absolute evidence of the use of wood cellulose or rags, as the case might be. Furthermore, I examined the pipe conveyers and ascertained the contents thereof, and in each case found it to be as stated—either wood cellulose or rags. Proceeding from the nitrating department, we came to the washing department, where the nitrated material is washed, and again I made a careful inspection of the contents of the washing tanks and confirmed the use of wood cellulose or rags. Passing from this department, we entered the building where grinding was in progress, and I ascertained beyond all doubt the nature of the materials so treated. The wood cellulose or rags was then rewashed, which concluded the process of preparation (and proved conclusively that no difference existed, whether the guncotton was prepared from linters, rags, or wood cellulose). During the process of this investigation special attention was directed to the easy absorbing capacity of the wood cellulose, and it was stated that wood cellulose contained when nitrated an especially high amount of nitrate (more than 13 per cent). On account of the cleanness of the wood cellulose the finished powder is especially described "bestandig"—that is, immune against decomposition. In the nature of cost, wood cellulose was declared to be one-third less than the price of linters. Before proceeding to the commercial effect of the restriction in the movement of cotton upon the future I would call attention to an illustration of effect of ignition upon nitrated materials, namely, rags and wood cellulose.

Quantities of both of these materials, after nitration, were taken from the buildings and placed upon the ground at some distance and there ignited by alcohol, no real difference being discernible between the action of the explosive force of the rags and wood cellulose. The nature of flame, response, character of smoke thrown off, and duration of action seemed identical. Later I was shown a similar demonstration in the smokeless powder derived from both materials, and again could find no difference. I merely state this as an instance of observation, for I am not in a position to give any technical information of value in the matter of witnessing such explosions. The illustration came about through the repeated statements that the forces of the allies could determine the difference in the character of ammunition used. This is said to be beyond the range of human possibility by explosive experts with whom I have discussed the matter, and is borne out by these demonstrations.

During the inspection of the Spandau Works, the following interesting facts were gleaned from Maj. Gorke and other officers, namely, that: Prior to August, 1914, all gunpowder and explosives were produced from saltpeter nitrogen, manufactured from saltpeter imported from Chile; that cotton linters prior to that date were exclusively used, and were mostly imported from the United States; that until seven years ago camphor, an essential part in the manufacture of explosives, was imported from Japan. The high price of camphor then induced German chemical manufacturers to produce synthetic camphor, which was manufactured to a great extent by the use of turpentine oil. The turpentine oil was an American product and large quantities, running into the millions of dollars in value, were imported for this purpose. The stoppage of this exportation from America by Great Britain compelled the German chemists to seek for a new substitute, and synthetic camphor is produced to-day from another material, which is considerably cheaper than turpentine and more effective than Japanese camphor. It is therefore shown that the German ammunition manufacturers have successfully solved all important questions, and that within the German domain is contained all necessary materials. At this time Germany is supplying, to a large extent, the ammunition demands of Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey, and has several months' reserves on hand for the necessities of most stringent warfare.

The losers by Great Britain's action are therefore:

First. Chile, two-thirds of whose saltpeter production, prior to the outbreak of war, found its way to Germany, for with the establishment of an industry for the production of nitrogen from the air, at a cost of 100,000,000 marks, this product will hereafter be supplied by Germany, and a saving has already been effected, for the price of Chilean saltpeter compared with German saltpeter is 9 as against 7 marks. This not only enables Germany to meet her own demands after the conclusion of war, but to become a competitor with Chile in the markets of the world.

Second. America, from whose cotton fields almost all the linters used in the manufacture of gunpowder and explosives were supplied. Now, in times of war and peace this demand is entirely removed, for the solution of the cellulose problem enables Germany to effect a considerable saving in cost and will lead, upon the conclusion of peace, to the elimination of linters from the manufacture of explosives.

Third. America, from whom supplies of turpentine oil were obtained at a cost of many millions of marks through the enforced substitution of a commodity created by necessity and claimed to be the superior of this American natural product.

In the matter of cotton holdings, it can be definitely stated that there is an ample sufficiency in hand to meet all military demands for the next three years, such as uniforms, hospital supplies, and other purposes. The same is said to be the case with wool, and one thing is certain, namely, that large purchases of wool and cotton in Turkey were made by the newly formed Deutsch-Orientelische Handelsgesellschaft, of which Mr. Alfred Lohman is president.

Returning to the question of the use of wood cellulose as a component part of manufacture of explosives, I would direct attention to the fact that 49 manufacturers' plants are engaged in the manufacture of wood pulp in the German Empire, and as a part of this report I submit a list of the names and locations of these plants.

I would furthermore direct attention to the fact that wood cellulose is used in explosives in the same relative manner as is cotton, namely, as a propellent; that the extent to which cotton has been used in this connection does not justify the statements so frequently circulated since the cotton question became an acute war issue.

Without the use of cellulose or rags there is a sufficiency of linters in German Government hands, but with the solution brought about by the perfection of wood pulp within the past 60 days a large amount of Government-owned linters have been released for industrial demands, and I saw at one place 3,000 bales of linters which were released by the Government to manufacturers because not required for military purposes. Careful inquiries from every source of knowledge at my command, namely, observation in the zones of activity, the statements of military authorities, the reports of the war press representatives, and the first-hand knowledge of civilians who have witnessed the passage of supplies to the various parts of the front, convinced me that there has been no necessity for a change in the manufacture of guns; that the wood cellulose propellent is of equal strength to the cotton propellent; that the rifling of the large arms of the service as well as the small weapons does not demand a change due to the difference of propellents in explosives, the same firing chamber being used to equal advantage.

I directed my investigations in these channels as far as possible not only on this present trip to Germany, but upon the numerous occasions which have presented themselves since the war began and which carried me to many parts of Germany and Belgium and the regions of military activities. One prominent attaché assured me that throughout his entire observation of German military progress, artillery was employed with the greatest freedom, and that at no time was there any scarcity of shells nor evidence of a varied nature of explosives employed. In concluding my report upon this important and far-reaching subject, I desire to note my interest in the matter by stating that I have absolutely no affiliation nor connection with any company or individual, either American, German, or of other nationality, who is engaged in or would profit by the movement of cotton from the United States to Germany. My interest in this matter is wholly political, for I feel that the Southern States have been deprived unfairly of one of their greatest markets; that the British Government has been forced against its will to act in bad faith by making cotton contraband; that certain Liverpool interests, actuated by purely financial reasons, were behind the false statements which developed into a preconceived campaign of misrepresentation as to the use of cotton for explosives; that is the extent to which cotton can be employed. For this reason I secured an opinion from Prof. Will, of the University of Berlin, and I am pleased to submit his letter of December 3, 1915, bearing on this subject. I will add that my real interest in seeing a restoration of commerce, guaranteed by the law of nations between Germany and the United States, comes through my desire to bring about a movement of dyestuffs from Germany to the United States. Having been instrumental in the securance of supplies of these important materials from Germany during the autumn and winter of 1914, I have closely followed the possibilities of providing American industries and labor with such essentials, and I find to-day that we are facing a serious industrial problem, which can only be overcome by a speedy solution of the commercial relations between Germany and the United States.

Very respectfully, yours, HOWARD W. BIBLE.

During the delivery of the speech of Mr. SMITH of Georgia,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia.

After the conclusion of the speech of Mr. SMITH of Georgia,

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, this war has been prolific on the part of all the belligerents of violations of the rules of international law as we have understood it heretofore. The Senator from Georgia deserves great credit for calling attention to the manner in which the British Government in one way or another has violated the rules of international law in respect to American commerce. Most of our commerce during the war has filtered into or through the little neutral countries of northern Europe—Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. Most of the commerce which has been held up by the British orders in council has been commerce and traffic plying to those countries.

Now, while in no manner justified, on the contrary I entirely agree with the conclusions reached by the Senator from Georgia in respect to the conduct of Great Britain, yet in this connection I want to present to the Senate another side of the picture. There are those four little countries that I have referred to in northern Europe. I have a list in my hand here of the number of merchant ships of those countries which have been sunk by German submarine boats and German mines since the war began up to the 14th of this month, and the list is perfectly startling. These are merchant vessels, traders. I will say that I have compiled this list from the leading commercial newspapers of the city of New York that have from day to day published an account.

The total number of vessels sunk by submarines, mines, and by warships—the latter being only one—is 134. One hundred and three have been sunk by German submarines, 30 have been sunk by mines, some of them German and perhaps some of them English, and 1 was sunk by a war vessel.

I have been able in this list to give the names of the vessels and to give the date when they were torpedoed or sunk. It appears from this list of 134 vessels that the total number of Dutch ships sunk is 11, the total number of Danish ships sunk is 15, the total number of Swedish ships sunk is 27, and the total number of Norwegian ships sunk is 81.

As I said the other day, since the German merchant marine has been eliminated from ocean traffic most of the trade traffic is carried on by our own ships, some by the English, and to a large extent by these neutrals.

I am unable to give in this list the tonnage of all the vessels. In some instances the tonnage has been given. Neither am I able to give a list of the people who have been destroyed when the ships were sunk, but it is a horrible record. In many instances many of the poor sailors, the crews on these vessels, have perished by reason of the submarines.

Now, there is this difference, to which I want to call the Senator's attention, between the British method and the German method. The British have held up our ships, taken them into port, searched their cargo and taken out what they conceived to be improper and either confiscated it or commandeered it, but in the main they have let the ships go; they have not destroyed the ships. The Germans have not only destroyed the cargo but they have destroyed the ships, and in many instances they have killed the crews on these vessels.

Of course these four little neutral countries of Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden are, in the face of these great powers, helpless. They have to submit to this treatment. I bring this to the attention of the Senate in order that when the great country of the United States intervenes in this matter it will see to it that the traffic of these neutral countries is protected—protected not only in the interest of our commerce, but in the interest of fair play to these neutral nations.

Just think of it, 134 vessels destroyed, mainly by German submarines, since the war commenced.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can the Senator give us the locality of those vessels, where they were principally?

Mr. NELSON. I can not give the locality. It has been done along the Norwegian and Swedish and Danish coast and the Holland coast in nearly every instance. I will say, in addition to that list, there are a great many Scandinavian vessels that have been taken into German ports, and have been condemned in their prize courts. There have been two or three instances where German warships have seized Swedish vessels within Sweden's territorial waters. One occurred a short time ago. They finally released it.

So, Mr. President, without intending to take up the time of the Senate any further, in view of the able speech of the Senator from Georgia, and in view of the fact that he presented one side of this picture of interfering with neutral rights, I felt it incumbent on me to present the other side of it, that the people of this country may see just what has transpired.

Mr. President, I ask that this list may be incorporated, without reading, as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The list referred to is as follows:

Data concerning the sinking of neutral vessels belonging to the northern neutral nations, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland, and which were sunk by belligerents engaged in the present European war by means of submarines, mines, or warships between the dates Aug. 1, 1914, and Jan. 14, 1916.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], with his usual good, hard, sound common sense, has said several things well worthy of remembrance, and especially this one thing, that there never was a war in the world between two or more great powers possessing land or sea strength when the rights of neutrals were strictly respected.

Mr. President, we carried on a war with France for quite a while once, when neither the French Republic nor the American Republic ever declared war, but the forces of the two countries were fighting one another upon the high seas, because the French Republic, under the control of the Convention, had defied every international law known up to that date.

Not long after that Great Britain, joining in with Prussia and with Austria, the continental powers, in making war upon the French Republic, violated nearly every right of neutrality the world had ever recognized by international law.

Mr. President, in all these troubles—this one and the previous trouble—there has been this marked distinction that goes to the heart of every man who has a heart. There was a class of hostilities and troubles that threatened and sacrificed our property. There was a class of hostilities and troubles that threatened and sacrificed our lives. Although I am not a great admirer of the ex-President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt, and never have been in a political sense, though his relations and mine personally have always been pleasant, he has said one thing that I, at least, think to be true, that any comparison between what the United States owes to her citizenship in connection with the sacrifice of life and what she owes to her citizenship in connection with the sacrifice of property is a comparison between resenting murder and resenting petty larceny. That utterance of Roosevelt is worth sinking into all your minds, and let it sink. It is true.

Mr. President, we had a war over here between the States not very many years ago as history goes, a great many years ago as the ordinary individual life goes, and what did your people do to mine? Was it your Army that whipped us? You know it was not. If it had not been for the women and children and men whom you starved to death and the soldiers who could no longer wear a uniform and shoot, because they had nothing to eat, I imagine we might have been fighting yet. Your Navy whipped us. Your sea power strangled us. Your sea power starved our civil population first and then starved our army afterwards.

The Confederate soldier was the most quixotic human being in the world, I reckon. He was fed on Sir Walter Scott's novels and upon the ideas of chivalry that he drank from that source and from others. We sometimes made complaint, as Admiral Semmes did, that a Yankee vessel had armor on it while our vessel did not, and that it was "not a gentlemanly way of fighting." We sometimes made complaint as an old friend of mine did, that he was captured by the Yankees because he was mounted on a Yankee mule and the mule went back to the braying of the other artillery mules in the Yankee line, in the battery from which the mule had been captured. Most quixotic claims were made by all of us; but there never was a Confederate from Jeff Davis down to the humblest soldier who ever "pleaded the baby act" because his wife and children and he were starved by your Navy.

You would not even let quinine come in. You would not let quinine come for your own soldiers at Andersonville to be administered by a Federal surgeon when Jeff Davis proposed it to you.

Now, I am not complaining here. My forefathers did not complain. War is war. It is not a system of caressing. [Laughter.] War is carried on subject to certain rules of civilized warfare. We people down there for a little while thought that Sherman was a regular barbarian. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] will remember that. You people thought for a little while that Admiral Semmes was "a sea pirate," at least you said so. Are they not both angels compared with what we have seen lately in Europe? Sherman did not do anything except to burn down houses of noncombatants and issue orders at Atlanta that noncombatants must get out of Atlanta, when the poor, helpless women and children had to "trek" as best they could. But that is absolutely angelic in comparison with what has been done lately in this European war. Who ever dreamed at that time that any civilized power had any right to strew the high seas with mines, not to destroy on purpose, but to destroy accidentally, anything that incidentally struck the mine? Who ever dreamed at that time that any power at war had a right to cast bombs from midair upon noncombatant women and children sleeping peacefully in villages and cities? Who ever thought at that time that any assassin of the sea had a right, without warning, to shoot and sink men and women and children upon an unarmed merchant ship? A lot of you here have been trying to excite yourselves and trying to excite the American people lately about 19 American citizens who were killed upon Mexican soil. Killed by whom? By the Mexican Government? No. Killed by anybody pretending to represent the Mexican Government? No. Killed by bandits, killed by robbers, robbed of their clothes and of their money when they were killed so as to prove that their murderers were robbers, and yet a lot of you seem to want to shed Mexican blood and have Mexicans shed your blood because of it—oh, I beg your pardon, not your blood, but the blood of some of your fellow American citizens. None of you want to have your blood shed, not a blessed one of you. A lot of you seem to want to shed the blood of Mexicans and to have Mexicans shed your national blood, we will call it—if there is any such thing—because 19 American citizens were killed by robbers and bandits upon Mexican soil—upon Mexican soil; remember that.

There was a man by the name of Jesse James who was more or less remotely connected with the Confederate military service. Later on, his way of carrying on war not being in accordance with the Confederate Government's idea of carrying on war, his connection with the Confederate Government became rather remote, but he carried on war in his way. Suppose that in February, 1865, Jesse James had happened to kill two or three British subjects while he was killing other people, and had happened to take their watches and their money away from them while he was taking the watches and money away from other people, and suppose that the British Government had written Abraham Lincoln and Secretary of State Seward at that time a note to the effect that they would be personally liable, and that the United States Government would be held liable, unless they caught Jesse James and punished him within some period, definite or indefinite, what would you have thought? You were powerless, even with all your power, to catch or to punish him.

You put a paper blockade upon the South; nobody ever pretended that your blockade was effective all the way down the line. The whole Atlantic coast and the whole Mexican coast was within the scope of your paper blockade, and whenever anybody violated that blockade, even if the violators got loose and escaped out upon the high seas, you captured their ships and confiscated their cargoes, and you had a right to do it. Whether you did or not the world submitted to it. My forefathers never plead the baby act about it. You whipped us in fair fight as war goes—war never is altogether fair—but you did it. Now, even-handed justice recommends the poisoned chalice to your own lips, including the doctrine of continuous voyage, which this Government either originated or very much emphasized and stretched.

Now, let me talk about cotton a little, for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has been talking about cotton. Cotton is worth twelve and thirty-eight one-hundredths cents a pound—middling spot cotton, not futures—in the Memphis market, which happens to be my market, and it has been worth that for two or three weeks. Prior to that time it was worth twelve and twelve and a half one hundredths cents per pound in the Memphis market for two or three months.

If peace came to-morrow, cotton would not be worth over 10 cents a pound. Why? The increased demand for explosives and tents and tarpaulins and uniforms and the increased rapidity in the destruction or wearing out of each. Whatever else this war has done, it has not lowered the price of cotton. True it is that for the first four or six months of the war the war did lower the price, because it dislocated the entire financial system, the entire exchange system, and the entire trade system. It demoralized everything in connection with imports and exports, but especially in connection with bank business, financial operations, and foreign exchange. We suffered enormously upon the first year's cotton crop after the war broke out, and I suffered my share. It has made me run pretty close to the shore for quite a long while. But at present what is becoming of the cotton crop? It is selling at from 1 to 2 cents per pound higher price than, with the same supply and demand, it would if all the world were at peace and there were no war uses for it. Why, Mr. President, Great Britain and France and Italy in normal times take 73 per cent plus of our entire cotton-export business, and that 73 per cent is going to them now. More than the usual amount is going abroad, outside of Germany, Austria, and Italy, for the neutral countries are not only getting their share, but Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland have been getting a little bit more, which has been pretendedly imported for themselves, but really shipped through them to Germany and her allies. So the 73 per cent amounts to-day to about 83 per cent. That is uninterfered with. Now, I want to talk plainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Mississippi will allow me to ask him a question, I will ask, does the Senator refer to our general exports or to our cotton exports?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I refer to cotton exports, of course.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Mississippi did not exactly understand me. I understand him now to be referring to our exports, and he did not say whether the countries he mentioned took 73 per cent of our cotton exports or whether they took 73 per cent of all our exports. I suppose he meant our cotton exports, and that was the reason I asked him the question, as I wanted to be sure that I correctly understood him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Georgia is right in his supposition, and I supposed that every Senator who understood the situation knew what I meant. Of course, our exports of cotton to Great Britain, France, and Italy could not constitute 73 per cent of our total exports of goods and merchandise, and if I failed properly to express myself——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I only want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that he is mistaken about that. If he will refer to the statistics of the department, he will find that those countries do not take 73 per cent; he will find that Germany, Austria, Norway, Holland, and Denmark take but one-third of our entire export of cotton, that Japan and other countries take about 10 per cent of it, and that the countries he names take not quite 60 per cent of it—about 55 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I stand upon my assertion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of course the Senator can stand upon it, but he is merely mistaken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Notwithstanding the Senator's denial, I say that, although I have not the papers by me and have not the statistics by me, Great Britain and her colonies and dependents—of course I meant to include them in the British trade—France and her dependencies, and Italy and her dependencies take about 73 per cent of our total cotton exports. Even if I were wrong about that, Holland and Norway and Sweden and Denmark have been getting during this entire war, except during the first four or five months of financial dislocation, which affected everybody, much more than their full normal share of our cotton.

Now, I want to say another thing—that if the Senator from Georgia could have his way, and if this Congress were to pass and the President were to sign the measures which he is advocating, it would necessarily result in nonintercourse with the allies, unless the allies were going to stand still like a lot of whipped curs, while they were engaged in a war which they believe to be for life and liberty and for national independence, and obey the ukase of a United States Congress, with 90,000 men in the Army behind its ukase and only the fourth navy in the world behind it. It is absurd to suppose that they would be cowardly enough to stand bullying from a people who can not bully because they have nothing behind them to bully with, who can not bluff because they hold no hand. Men from the time they are children are bullies. A schoolboy never bullies a fellow that he knows is bigger and stronger and whom he believes braver than he is. He generally bullies somebody he thinks is weaker than he is or else who is, in his opinion, more cowardly than he is—one of the two. You stand here and say to Great Britain, to the allies, and to the balance of the world that you propose to put an embargo on the shipment of ammunition and munitions of war, contrary to our traditional theory, unless they change their paper blockade—if you choose to call it a paper blockade, but which seems to be wonderfully effective, because it stops every ship, which is more than your northern blockade did during the War between the States—you stand here and say that to them and then expect them to lie down in a fight which they believe to be a fight for the liberty and independence of the world against a newer Roman Empire, revamped and revarnished—expect them to keep quiet and purr without even growling. Will they? Of course not.

Then what will follow? Commercial nonintercourse. Then what becomes of cotton? Cut off the British market and cut off the French and the Italian market and their colonies and their dependencies, and cotton would not be worth 4 cents a pound week after next. You will not even have helped, but would have murdered the price of cotton, even after you had been base enough to make that the chief consideration of your policy.

I hate to argue a great international question from the standpoint of a special interest, even though it be my interest. I do not think it is worthy of the occasion. I do not think that the fact that I might or might not be temporarily disfinanced by this war——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will in a moment—is a sufficient reason for undertaking to let the Germans or English or French or Russians or Italians or anybody else kill American boys summoned to the colors, unprepared and undrilled and untrained, to be murdered. I do not believe it is a sufficient reason for me to justify myself for killing other country's boys even if ours were trained and drilled and ready.

Mr. President, I hope to live to see the day sometime when internationalism will become popular and when the narrow feeling, which is highly creditable as patriotism, will at least not be the leading thought of the world. I hope some day to see "a parliament of man; a federation of the world." I have not lost my hope nor have I lost my trust because of this European war. I have learned, to my sorrow and regret, that the world is less civilized by 100 years than I was foolish enough to think, but I believe still that somehow God reigns and that we are His instruments.

I thought the time had passed when noncombatants could be arraigned and put under peace bonds to keep everybody from shooting against an invading foe, and when they could not keep somebody—a foolish somebody maybe—from indulging in it they would be lined up by a belligerent as Belgian men and boys have been and shot like cattle. I did not believe that that was a possibility. It is not the first instance in my life when I have been a fool. That time I was one.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield to the Senator in one second.

Mr. President, the interruption of the Senator from Nebraska has for a moment taken me off the track, but I will try to conclude that thought as briefly as I can. I have come to the conclusion that the forces making for peace and liberty and honor and contract keeping and righteousness in this world have got somehow to whip the forces that are fighting for the other and opposite things; and I would hurl foul scorn at myself as my father's son if I ever came to the conclusion that I had no right to fight for liberty and righteousness and national independence and the life of my women and children against world dominion and somebody's "place in the sun," if it became necessary to fight. I am no professional combatant, either. I have for long years submitted to hearing myself denounced as "a peace fanatic," and in a certain sense I am, for "my passion is peace," as Thomas Jefferson said, not only nationally but in every other way. I would not lift my foot against an ant upon the sidewalk if I could help it. But it is about time we were recognizing facts; and, above all things, I do not want to see Dixie, I do not want to see Georgia, Mississippi, and old Virginia, and the volunteer State of Tennessee and her sisters, Louisiana and Arkansas and the Carolinas, and all the other Southern States, put in the attitude of seeming, at any rate, to care just as much about property as they do about life; of seeming, at any rate, to care more about their particular property, which is the cotton crop, than they do about the women and children that went down unknelled and unshriven to their graves in the sea, not upon German soil, as the 19 Americans were upon Mexican soil, but upon the high seas, the property of no Government and of no power, and upon unarmed merchant vessels—"unknelled, unhonored, unsung," and unwarned. Until that question is settled I do not propose to join in any movement to nag the President of the United States and to nag this present Democratic administration—and, by the way, for a Republican administration I would say the same thing; at least I think I would, although I am not sure [laughter], because nobody is perfectly certain of himself when he is as dyed-in-the-wool partisan as I am; but I believe I would—I shall not join in any movement to nag them into something that must result in—I hardly know what it would result in, but it must result in something very bad, something worse than we can at the present time predict, at any rate.

Mr. President, I think I know my people, and when I say that, I do not mean the people of the whole United States, because I am a provincialist, an ultra southerner, and I am not in the very highest and most catholic sense even a citizen of the United States; but I do, I think, know my people, and I know that the men who followed Jackson and Lee and whose wives and children starved and who themselves starved in what they thought a holy cause—the men who followed Stonewall Jackson in his last campaign up the valley, when they had nothing to eat but parched corn and were rationed like the horses—except that the horses ate the corn raw and they ate it parched—are not ready yet to put cotton and human life upon the same level, and especially when they have sense enough to know that it would not even help cotton if they did, and that the only hope for cotton is keeping open the English, French, Italian, and neutral markets of the world. Now, I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has said that he would not assert the neutral rights of the United States with the Army and Navy because they are inadequate. He has said, in effect, that he would not assert through the powers of Congress commercial pressure to compel a country to recognize our neutral rights. Now, I ask him what he would do when a country defies the protests we make against the outrages of our rights as a neutral? What would he do if he would not take either of these other courses?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if ever I said either one of those two things which the Senator from Nebraska has attributed to me, I must have said them in a dream or while I was asleep. I have forgotten them, if I ever did say them. What would I do? That question is pertinent, and I shall answer it. I should do what the United States Government did during the French revolutionary war and during the Napoleonic wars and during all the other periods of our history when we were faced with this unfortunate situation of maddened, angered, blood-intoxicated belligerents, not respecting neutral rights. I would lodge my protest, and I would uphold the principles of international law and the rights of neutrals until a proper day of reckoning came under our treaties and under general international law, rather than fight about money, if the sole cause of the quarrel were either money or base merchandise; I would wait until the people to whom I had appealed, or to whose Government I had appealed, had become sober and cool, and then I would accomplish about what the United States Government did in the case of the Geneva award. Abraham Lincoln and Seward and the men other than Seward who were advising Abraham Lincoln did not push that matter just at that time, but when the proper time came they did push it. All quarrels about money can be cured with money, and all delay in curing them with money is measured by universal agreement by a rate of interest. I would not kill one human being on the surface of this globe, American or foreign, because of mere property or because of mere dollars until I had been able at least to appeal to a cool and self-possessed court, not maddened by war passion, not intoxicated with blood, and had then found that a foreign power had deliberately, coldly, and purposely refused to do me justice, even after an award. Then, if that took place, I would fight with what heart and strength and might and main that God had given me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I had one other question that I wanted to present to the Senator. Of course, there is some precedent for some such method, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] suggests, such as the acts passed during the administrations of Washington and of Jefferson, the patron saint of the Senator from Mississippi, but I do not care to refer to them, although I should like to hear the Senator express his opinion of them. I want to say to the Senator, however, that there may be another issue besides money—a direct sovereign right of the United States may be invaded, as we know it has been invaded. Does the Senator know anything about the violation of the mails of the United States upon the high seas? Does he know that 63 bags of mail sent upon a Holland boat from New York to Rotterdam were seized upon the high seas, taken into the Downs, and those 63 bags of United States mail, addressed to a neutral country, were taken upon English soil——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator means, addressed to citizens of a neutral country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; I mean to say that the universal postal convention, enacted and reenacted for many years, in which every civilized country of the world takes part, guarantees the immunity of the mails, and contains the solemn promise that every party to it will permit the mails to cross its dominions free and immune. Finding that Great Britain insisted on censoring our mails which touch at British ports, our Post Office Department began the plan of shipping neutral mails direct to a neutral port, and then Great Britain seized those mails upon the high seas—first-class mail and registered letters, and sent by neutral citizens of one country to neutral citizens of another country—took them into a British port, and have not yet consented to render any justice. Now, I ask the Senator, suppose that right, that sovereign right, of the United States to send its mails to a neutral country is not acknowledged by Great Britain, what would the Senator do under those circumstances if he would not fight and would not pass legislation?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What the Senator wants me to say, I suppose, is that I would agree to declare war upon Great Britain and have a whole lot of Irishmen, Englishmen, Welshmen, and Scotchmen and a whole lot of Americans and Canadians and Australians killed because my mail had been interfered with. Well, I decline to do it. [Laughter in the galleries.] That is all there is about that. I do not know how important the Senator's mail is, but mine is not important enough for that; and I do not think the mail of the average citizen of the United States is, unless it is some spy within the United States bearing the title of an American citizen while he really bears allegiance to some foreign government, and, so far as he is concerned, I do not care whether his mail is interfered with or not. I pass over any reference to the single great mistake of my patron saint's—Mr. Jefferson's—life, his embargo and nonintercourse acts, which hurt us more than our enemies, and maddened New England to the verge of secession.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit another question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator know what the instructions of the English Government are to its censors who examine American mail?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nobody else does, precisely. I know what I have seen in American newspapers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I have the confidential——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not care about the details.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, let me tell the Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I do not care about them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But I should like, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not care what they are; I am not going to shed one drop of American or Canadian blood on account of any confounded [laughter in the galleries]—I beg pardon—on account of any foolish action of the British censors with regard to letters and parcel-post matter. So it is absolutely immaterial as to what they have said; I do not care about the itemized account. What they have done is wrong, and I refuse, notwithstanding it is wrong, to cut their throats about it. That is sufficient.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator does not care if the business mails of the United States are opened, and the bills of lading are examined, and the weights and prices are taken, and they are all taken to a central authority in Great Britain, where they can be transferred to the British manufacturers and the British shipping agents, so that they may know the secrets of the United States business men and may steal away their trade in the midst of war? The Senator does not care for that? If they do that act under the great war power of censoring the mails for the purpose of promoting their own commerce, does not the Senator care?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Mississippi "cares" in a certain sense. Of course the Senator resents every act of a belligerent which violates neutral rights. I am not talking about not caring. If I said I did not care, my mouth overshot my intellect. But what I do mean is that I do not care enough to shed human blood about it. Now, as to whether the British censors take these private business letters and hand them over to British business concerns, do you know, I do not believe a word of that. I think Great Britain is a little bit too busy in war on land and on sea just at present, fighting to maintain her naval supremacy and her empire, to be engaged very much as a government right now in discovering or betraying "trade secrets." But, whether she is or not, it is one of the sad things that always accompanies a nearly universal war between peoples when each side thinks it is fighting for its existence and when they are not paying as much attention as they ought to to the bystander. It is just as if the Senator from Wyoming and I became inflamed, and both were armed and prepared, and began to shoot at one another on the street; if a bystander happened to run in between our shots it would be very bad for the bystander, and if my bullet happened to go plumb through his body or his bullet through mine and hit somebody else on the other side it would be bad for that person.

Now, you must recognize facts. When you get people engaged in deadly warfare, fighting, as they think, for their very lives, for their very liberty and national integrity, for their very civilization and culture, respectively, they are thinking chiefly about themselves; secondly, about the enemy; and thirdly, about neutrals. "You all" paid mighty little attention to neutrals during the war when you were whipping us, when you strangled us, and when you starved us—and you only whipped us by starving us. Your sea power is the way you whipped us, and you had a right to do it, after once war was declared, provided your right to declare it was recognized. We had gone into it. We went into it with our eyes open. We knew what we were meeting. You struck a country that never had made food enough to feed its own population during any year of its existence, and does not do it even now. You had a plain open-and-shut game before you. If you could just keep up the embargo long enough we would die by self-strangulation, by starvation; and we did.

No; I am not saying that I do not care about these violations of neutral rights. I am merely saying what I said a moment ago—that I do not care enough about them to shed blood about them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I went further than that, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Here are 3,000 miles of boundary between us and Canada up here. We never have had a fort along that line. They are as much Americans as we are, although they call themselves Canadians, and we assume to ourselves the name of an entire continent. Do I want my boy to go out and kill Canadian boys, and Canadian boys to come in and kill my boy—and if we go to war some of my boys will be in it—because somebody stopped Mr. Threefoot's mail on its way to Schweissenkopt or somewhere else in Sweden, Copenhagen, Norway, or somewhere else?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] does not propose to go to war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no. He proposes to do what will force us into commercial nonintercourse, with the hazard of war half considered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And the Senator is not in favor of that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I am not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is he in favor of? Again I ask him, What is he in favor of doing for the purpose of compelling the observance of our neutral rights?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have told the Senator twice.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He is in favor of letting them go on——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And prosecuting a damage suit in some future years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, well!

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is he in favor of doing for the purpose of stopping them now?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska as an individual did me some money wrong, as an individual he would not think it was cowardice or poltroonery upon my part if I said that I would leave it to the determination of some cool, nonimpassioned third party to act as a judge. Now, why should it be cowardice or poltroonery between nations?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, then, suppose the thing went on, the offense continued, indefinitely?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, well, suppose that the moon were made of green cheese. [Laughter in the galleries.] We have not arrived at that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The occupants of the galleries will please preserve order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are there now, right in the midst of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; we are not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has been going on for months.

Mr. WILLIAMS. God's honest truth is that—no; I will not say that, because there are some truths that you ought not to tell upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, I have already said what I thought we ought to do. What I think we ought to do is that where a damage sounds in money we ought to claim money in damages, and where there is nothing at stake except money that we ought not to shed blood in order to constitute for ourselves a remedy. In other words, I illustrated it by the Geneva award. I could have illustrated it by a hundred other cases where a neutral country, when two belligerents were excited and blood intoxicated, waited for money-indemnity cure until a time came suited to it. I would not surrender one neutral right in the world. I would declare and redeclare every one of them. I would protest against every violation; but I would not shed blood about base merchandise if I could help it.

That it is my answer, and, if it is not sufficient, it is all the answer I can make. The only thing I would shed blood about is blood. When a man came to taking the blood of my wife and my children, then I would want his. The distinction seems to me to be pretty plain. It is plain to men who were raised as I was raised. I never heard, in the time of the duello in the South, about gentlemen ever challenging one another about money. I never heard that the worst duelist fanatic in the world ever wanted to kill another man about a bill or about a property damage, and I am not going to do it now.

Mr. President, 19 American citizens are killed on Mexican soil, and a whole lot of you want to nag and nag and nag your President into a course of conduct that will result in war with the Mexican people. You want to go down and kill a lot of Mexican peons and a lot of Yaquis and a lot of other Mexicans because a Jesse James bandit somewhere robbed and killed a certain number of your citizens. And yet not a blessed one of you is introducing a resolution about the several hundred Americans killed, not on German soil but upon the high seas; not by irresponsible bandits but by the prepared and declared policy of a Government. And why? Why are you pursuing such different courses? Simply because you think Mexico is little enough to be kicked, and Germany is too big to be kicked. That is all.

I am not blaming you about the course pursued with regard to Germany. I make many allowances for those people. I do not hate Germans and Germany. I love German literature; I love German history; I love German lakes and rivers and mountains and seas; I love German culture, and I love especially the people of the Rhine country and about Wurtemberg and Schwaben and Bavaria. I know they are my equals and yours. I am not quarreling with you because you are not nagging the President about Germany. I am not quarreling with you about that; but I am quarreling with you because you are nagging him about Mexico when no Mexican governmental offense has been committed, and when you dare not nag him about Germany. You are wise when you do not. You had better get ready, so that you can support your "nagging," before you get to nagging anybody who can fight back. What is more, you know it, and by divergent courses of conduct and elocution you are daily and hourly confessing it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] brought to the attention of the Senate a list of vessels that had been sunk by German torpedo boats, submarines, mines, or some other kind of device, and he stated that he desired both sides of the case presented to the Senate.

We may all congratulate ourselves that the side of the United States, so far as Germany is concerned, has been presented and that every indication justifies the hope that the position of the United States upon the subject of safety at sea has been recognized, and that great good has resulted from the course pursued by our Government. I wish, however, to call attention to the fact that in February the President of the United States submitted both to Germany and to Great Britain a request that each should agree in future to cease acts violative of established rules of international law—Germany to abandon her submarine attacks, Great Britain to abandon her disregard of international law in the suppression of shipments of foodstuffs going to Germany. Germany's answer practically accepted the suggestion of the United States, and Great Britain's practically repudiated it.

I am no apologist for what has been done by Germany. I am proud of the fact that our Government has contributed to bring to a stop conduct upon the ocean that endangered human life. But, Mr. President, to call attention to the fact that Great Britain has not only disregarded our rights upon the ocean, but continues to do so, and refuses absolutely to recognize the sovereign rights of this country, should not in any sense be considered a condonation of what Germany has done.

Our German troubles are practically over; and the beneficial results of the communications that have passed between the two countries I trust will live in time to come.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a minute?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I do not interrupt the Senator for the purpose of disturbing him or annoying him in his argument.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It will not disturb me at all.

Mr. NELSON. I simply want to call his attention to the fact that so far as our negotiations with the German Government related to submarines, there was only an understanding as to what they call "liners," the great steamships that carry passengers on regular routes. The agreement or understanding, or whatever you may call it, that was made between our Government and the German Government, related only to that kind of ships, and not to the freighters—not to other ships than merely the liners that carry passengers on regular routes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. I think it extends to stopping before sinking freighters also. I so understand it.

What is the attitude of Great Britain? Each violation by Great Britain is followed by another violation of our international rights. Because Germany has been guilty of murder, are we for that reason to concede the right of perpetual robbery to Great Britain? Are we, each time we ask for recognition by the Senate and by the House of our rights upon the ocean, disregarded by Great Britain, to be turned off from their consideration by something that I trust is a thing of the past, and has been practically disposed of by diplomatic negotiations? I trust not.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], differing so much as he does at different times both in the accuracy of his intellect and in his style of expression, this afternoon presented himself in an inaccurate frame of mind. He declared that the first assertion of the right of seizure of ships or cargoes upon the theory of continuous voyage was set up by the United States during the Civil War. Why, the Senator does not manifest his usual familiarity with history. He surely should know the earlier cases in which this doctrine was set up in Great Britain, and the difference between the two lines of thought. He says that during the Civil War the United States Government blockaded the coasts of all the Southern States and of Mexico. Again he shows his utter inaccuracy, his lack of knowledge upon which to predicate a statement. The order of blockade issued by President Lincoln was limited to the Rio Grande, and if the Senator were at all familiar with the cases upon this subject he would know that in the Peterhof case the Supreme Court called attention to the fact that the order of blockade stopped at the Rio Grande, and that it did not apply to Matamoras, across the Rio Grande, and that innocent commerce could pass into the Confederate States through Matamoras free from any interference by the United States.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator if he can tell how long prior to the Civil War England had abandoned the doctrine of continuous voyage?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The continuous-voyage rule, as laid down by Great Britain before the Civil War and as laid down by the National Government during the Civil War, has no connection whatever with the issue to-day between the United States and Great Britain. The continuous-voyage doctrine as laid down by Great Britain was with reference to her colonies, and limited to them, and it does not touch our issue at all.

Mr. STERLING. And even the doctrine of continuous voyage, as it related to the colonies of Great Britain, had been abandoned long prior to the Civil War; had it not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think so. It had been questioned, at least, and I think there had been no continued enforcement of it.

The doctrine asserted by the United States in the Bermuda case was on a construction of facts; the court found that the vessel left England with the purpose, really, of going to Charleston and running the blockade, and for this reason it was subject to seizure at any time, though it nominally had a destination of Nassau, while its real destination was a southern port closed by blockade. That was the doctrine of the Bermuda case, and that was the doctrine applied to the goods in the Springbok case.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia, so that this matter can be gotten straight, whether there has been any controversy whatever between our Government and Great Britain in this matter touching the doctrine of continuous voyage?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think not.

Mr. WALSH. Do not both of them admit the doctrine as applied to the present situation?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think each agree that the doctrine of a continuous voyage does not justify a belligerent in seizing neutral goods going to a neutral port, and from there to the enemy, if the goods are innocent.

Mr. WALSH. The United States concedes that they may justly apply the doctrine of continuous voyage?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To contraband.

Mr. WALSH. To contraband.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why, certainly; and Great Britain has never asserted the right under rules of international law to apply it to innocent goods, or to apply it to conditional contraband where she could not show that the conditional contraband was intended for the army or navy of the enemy. She has not proceeded under the rules of international law. She has set up a bald order in council, setting aside international law.

But the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has assumed to speak for "my people." He is very eloquent when he talks about "my people," though not always very accurate. It always amuses me when he discusses a business question. He is entitled to preeminence for his incapacity to handle business questions, either in discussion or in reference to statistics. He tells us he is the cotton planter from Mississippi! I desire to assure the people of the country that they are not limited to his production for their supplies. [Laughter.]

But the Senator from Mississippi turned on me with a ferocious look—I almost trembled—and asserted that "my people would resist the idea of putting money above life." Then he talked about the "code duello." Well, he has lived ages ago. I do not know anything about that. Thank God, it had passed out before I came along. I deny his right to suggest, directly or indirectly, that those of us who criticize the course of Great Britain in suppressing our legal trade have placed commerce above life. It is an unfounded suggestion. It is an inexcusable one. It is the refuge of the advocate to divert attention from the real charge.

There is not a people anywhere more loyal to personal rights than the people of the section that I have the privilege in part to represent; but I do not place them in that respect ahead of our neighbors farther north or west. My own belief is that the people of our entire country, let them come from where they will, place life above property. But I have yet to find, even in my section, those who for that reason are willing to have all their property rights and the sovereign rights of this Nation disregarded. There may be some few who, like the Senator from Mississippi, soar in such lofty flights at times that they place property so low that they object to any word ever being spoken in defense of it; but I deny that that sentiment represents the people of the section from which I come. I am sure that they would not embarrass the President.

The Senator says that we are seeking to nag the President. The statement is absurd. It is from lack of information that the Senator so expresses himself. Unfortunately, he did not have the advantage of hearing the entire presentation of the subject which I made. He only came in at the last, and lacks information; and now he has left, and still insists upon not being informed.

Mr. President and Senators, I would not nag the President. I have the highest regard for him. I expect to support him this fall for reelection, and I hope the good judgment of the people of the country will keep him where he is. I do not differ with the President about this matter. I am following the letters of the State Department, and asking Congress to do its part. I do not mean that under no circumstances would I differ with the President. If I thought a President was doing anything calculated to involve this country in war which was unnecessary, I would deem it the part of patriotism to protest his action. I do not admit that a President must be followed if his conduct would bring the country to war, when those who have the right to declare war disagree with him. Fortunately, however, no such condition confronts us. The President has resisted, under great pressure, those who would have involved us in war.

The President placed the loss of life first in his diplomatic notes; but he did not fail, as the negotiations moved along, to present a most earnest protest against the illegality of the course of Great Britain. In opening my remarks I took occasion to call attention to the splendid letter of March 30 and to show that that letter protests squarely not only what Great Britain is doing now, but the right of Great Britain, if a complete blockade should be made, to stop our trade to neutral ports.

Mr. President, that splendid country, Sweden, those brave people, are standing out for their commercial rights. I want to reach a hand across the ocean and say: "We stand by you," not in a spirit of war but in a spirt of courage and manhood; not in a spirit of bullying. I have uttered no words that sounded like bullying. The face of the Senator from Mississippi, as he turned upon me, had every appearance that I was to be bullied and silenced; but for some reason I was not frightened, even by his assumption of knowledge and superiority. What I ask is that we let it be known that we understand our rights, not to bully Great Britain, but to call on Great Britain to return to law, to return to the law which she has made, and give her great statesman the support that action on our part would furnish to stand out against lawless acts. I long to see those principles of international law that Great Britain and the United States together have given to the world fully followed by both nations; that they may mitigate the evils of war and help to strengthen the rights of those at peace.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am not going to prolong this discussion longer than a very brief moment, but I want to submit a few observations. That England's interference with business intercourse between the neutral nations on the high seas is in violation of international law which she herself was a party to writing and which she herself had admitted to be the law from time immemorial there is no question. The people of the State whom I have the honor to represent in this Chamber have suffered grievously from that violation. It has cost the cotton growers of the South on the crop of 1915, in my judgment, not less than one quarter of a billion dollars. It has enabled the manufacturers of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Russia and the manufacturers in the United States to obtain cotton for their mills at 75 per cent of its true value, and the losses resulting from this unfortunate situation have fallen heavily upon the men, women, and children who toiled for 12 long weary months to produce the cotton. Something has been said about going to war—taking human life to promote commercial interests. Mr. President, I do not want to go to war; I would not go to war for the purpose of promoting commercial interests. I would not have the United States Government sacrifice one soldier for all the money on earth. But I maintain it is incumbent upon the United States Government to protect the business interests of its citizens. I hold it is just as much the duty of the American Government to protect her citizens against robbery, against plunder; in other words, protect them in the enjoyment of their liberty and property as it is to protect them in the enjoyment of life. Unless they shall be thus protected, life would not be worth living. If the business rights of the citizens are not protected, if international law shall be violated and our citizens robbed and plundered without interference or protest on the part of our own Government, it is but a short step from such a violation of the law to that of murder. No; we do not want war, and every means possible consistent with honor should be exhausted and every expedient available should be employed to avoid war, with all of its horrible consequences. Nobody is asking the United States to go to war with Great Britain at this time in order to protect the business interests of the people of America and force her to observe the law. But the reverse is true. We are only asking the United States Government to employ peaceful means within its power by which the Government of Great Britain may be induced to respect the business rights of the American people.

Now, to say that we will permit England to continue the methods of the highwayman, which she has persisted in for nearly a year without protest, lest she may retaliate by cutting off all business intercourse, is asking the American people to be guilty of something which to my mind approaches pusillanimity. If the Congress shall pass an act putting an embargo upon the shipments of munitions to the allies, to remain in force until the allies shall cease to interfere with trade between the neutral nations, it would be doing no more than we have a right inherently to do. We have a right to employ retaliatory or any other measures for the protection of the American people, and if war should come from the exercise of our inherent, legitimate rights the responsibility for war will not be upon the American people. I hope, Mr. President, that we have not become a nation of cravens. We will not sell our manhood for 4 cents a pound on cotton; we will not yield to the tyrant's demand, even though it should involve us in war; and I want to say further just in this connection that the American Government is amply able both on the sea and land to defend the rights of her people. We have the greatest Navy to-day the world has ever known, with the exception of Great Britain's and as large an army as may be necessary to defend the American flag and keep that sacred emblem in the air, and we are ready to-day to do service in that noble undertaking. I am very weary, if I may be permitted to use that cant expression, Mr. President, of listening to all this talk both in the Halls of Congress and in the public press about the inadequacy of our Navy and insufficiency of our Army. The contention made by the Senator from Georgia is sustained by all writers of international law. He is in this matter only following the lead of the President of the United States and of the great Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, in his interpretation of the law. He has insisted upon what every other patriotic representative of the American people should insist upon, that even the exigencies of war can not be urged as an excuse for a gross and palpable violation of international law, especially a violation of the law which is followed by such disastrous consequences as that which flows from the conduct of the allies in interfering with the legitimate commerce of a neutral country. All we ask is justice—that the rights of our citizens shall be respected and the honor of the Nation upheld. For my country—

I am not covetous for gold,
Nor care I who doth feed upon my cost;
It yearns me not if men my garments wear;
Such outward things dwell not in my desires;
But if it be a sin to covet honor,
I am the most offending soul alive.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be until Monday next. I make this motion because there is a great deal of committee work to do, and I have been requested by Members on both sides to be given an opportunity to complete certain committee work.

The motion was agreed to.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by the Senator from Arkansas insert:

Within two years after the passage of this act the President shall invite the cooperation of the principal nations interested in the affairs of that part of the world in which the Philippines are located, for the purpose and to the end that the cooperating nations shall mutually pledge themselves, in the form of a treaty or other binding agreement, to recognize and respect the sovereignty and independence of the said Philippines, and also to mutually obligate themselves, equally and not one primarily nor to any greater extent than another, to maintain as against external force the sovereignty of said Philippines for the period of not less than five years from the taking effect of such treaty or agreement.

Within one year after the taking effect of such treaty or agreement the President is hereby authorized and directed to withdraw and surrender all right of possession, supervision, jurisdiction, control, or sovereignty now existing and exercised by the United States in and over the territory and people of the Philippines.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I submit the following amendment to Senate bill 381, the Philippine government bill, which I should like to have printed.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. After the word "appoint," on line 10, page 21, insert "all executive secretaries, directors and assistant directors, chiefs and assistant chiefs, superintendents and assistant superintendents of departments, bureaus, and divisions, the attorney general and assistant attorney general, collectors and deputy collectors of customs, and," and after the word "such," on line 11, insert the word "other," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 22. That the supreme executive power shall be vested in an executive officer, whose official title shall be "The Governor General of the Philippine Islands." He shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and hold his office at the pleasure of the President and until his successor is chosen and qualified. The Governor General shall reside in the Philippine Islands during his official incumbency and maintain his office at the seat of government. He shall, unless otherwise herein provided, appoint all executive secretaries, directors and assistant directors, chiefs and assistant chiefs, superintendents and assistant superintendents of departments, bureaus, and divisions, the attorney general and assistant attorney general, collectors and deputy collectors of customs, and, by and with the consent of the Philippine Senate, such other officers as may now be appointed by the Governor General, or such as he is authorized by this act to appoint, or whom he may hereafter be authorized by law to appoint; but appointments made while the senate is not in session shall be effective either until disapproval or until the next adjournment of the senate, etc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, in view of the fact that there will be no session to-morrow, and there is no likelihood of disposing of the bill this afternoon, I desire to submit to the Senator in charge of the bill if it would not be proper to terminate the proceeding upon it at least formally. It is perfectly evident that the measure can not be disposed of to-day, and by running over until Monday it is likely that it can be disposed of on that day or certainly the day following.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is thoroughly satisfactory to me either to lay the bill aside temporarily or to adjourn. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is temporarily laid aside.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico:

H. R. 65. An act to ratify, approve, and confirm an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to certain gas, electric light and power, telephone, railroad, and street railway companies and franchises in the Territory of Hawaii, and amending the laws relating thereto;

H. R. 3042. An act to ratify, approve, and confirm sections 1, 2, and 3 of an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory, as herein amended, and amending the laws relating thereto; and

H. R. 6241. An act to ratify, approve, and confirm an act amending the franchise granted to H. P. Baldwin, R. A. Wadsworth, J. N. S. Williams, D. C. Lindsay, C. D. Lufkin, James L. Coke, and W. T. Robinson, and now held under assignment to Island Electric Co. (Ltd.), by extending it to include the Makawao district on the island of Maui, Territory of Hawaii; and extending the control of the public-utilities commission of the Territory of Hawaii to said franchise and its holder.

H. R. 153. An act to create a bureau of labor safety in the Department of Labor was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

H. R. 407. An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 24, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 20, 1916.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 20, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William A. Leopold, D. D., of Bethany Evangelical Church, Norristown, Pa., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God of nations and of people, we come to Thee with grateful hearts this morning, and thank Thee for health of body, strength of purpose. Guide us this day, we pray Thee, in all the ways of truth and righteousness. We can not trust ourselves, we can not trust the elements of the universe, but we can trust Thee, O Thou Supernal Guide. Guide us in all the affairs of life, and let Thy blessing rest upon the President of the United States and his Cabinet. Bless the Members of the Congress. Guide us all in the ways of righteousness and wisdom and true holiness. Help us to do right and fear no one but God, and serve Thee—the true and living God. Thy blessing be upon us as we go through the journey of life, and at last receive us into Thine own blessed kingdom, through Him who taught us to say, when we pray, Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name; Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven; give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us, and lead us by Thy council in all the ways of righteousness, and in the end receive us as Thine. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. LAZARO, be granted leave of absence for 10 days on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. LAZARO, be granted 10 days' leave of absence on account of important business. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST ITALIANS.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague Mr. SIEGEL, who is absent at a committee hearing, may extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein two letters, one to himself and his answer thereto, in relation to alleged discrimination against citizens of Italian birth at the Military Academy at West Point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] asks unanimous consent that his colleague Mr. SIEGEL, who is unavoidably absent, may extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing two letters in relation to alleged discrimination against Italians at West Point. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes. Pending that motion I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] if we can agree upon dispensing with general debate?

Mr. CANNON. I can not agree to dispense with all general debate. Two members of the committee, not including myself, and I might want to submit a few remarks, have made requests for time, as well as others. I may say that I have requests for three hours and a half of time. I think perhaps I could get along with less than that, but two members of the committee desire to have, one, 45 minutes, and the other 40 minutes. I have a request from my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], for 60 minutes. I do not know whether he is fully in earnest about that.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, surely.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in lieu of the fact that the House has been in general debate since the Christmas holidays, and that there are some matters in this bill that are of peculiarly urgent character, it seems to me that we should endeavor to have this general debate on some other bills where general debate is in order. I have one request on this side for one hour. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he take two hours and this side will take one hour, and that he ask some of those who have made requests to take time on some other bills.

Mr. CANNON. I will try to get along with that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to three hours, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and one hour by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be confined to three hours, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and one hour by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9416, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, with Mr. HARRISON in the chair.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois to use some of his time. Any statement that I have to make regarding the bill can better be made under the five-minute rule, I think.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, this is the first bill reported by the Appropriations Committee, and I think it an appropriate time to discuss briefly the recommendations for appropriations which the administration has forwarded to us in the Book of Estimates. The appropriations made last year amounted to $1,114,937,012.02, being larger than had ever been made at any session of any preceding Congress. Now the President recommends to us that we appropriate in this session $1,285,857,808.16, a hundred and seventy-one millions more than the appropriations of last year, exclusive of deficiency and miscellaneous appropriations, which amounted then to $14,600,000 and are likely to be larger this year, and so will make this year's appropriations nearly $200,000,000 larger than last year's.

The greater part of this increase is for the Army and the Navy. For these increases I have no criticism. While I do not wish to take the time of the House now to discuss the endless subject of preparedness, I will very concisely state my position as to these appropriations.

I believe this country is in serious danger of an attack which would cost us more in 1 year than we could spend on our Army and Navy in 50 years. If either side wins in the present European war, it will emerge with a fighting machine such as the world has never known and before which we are helpless. Its navy could blow ours from the sea or bottle it tight in our ports. Between Penobscot Bay and the Chesapeake are numerous undefended harbors, where in a month they could land an army of veterans supplied with every appliance known to war and which our few ill-equipped troops would be powerless to resist. It could take our fortified cities in the rear, where they are unprotected, and easily master the richest part of our country and the seat of our greatest industries and levy contributions beside which the suggested appropriations for defense are infinitesimal. By a possible alliance with a power on the Pacific, our western coast might suffer the same fate.

It is often asserted that the victor in this war will be too exhausted for such an attack. But the victor will be at the summit of its military power, with seasoned troops, every kind of artillery and ammunition and aeroplanes and armored motors—in short, it will be rich in everything martial which we lack, and it will be poor in the products of peace, food, and clothing and luxuries and gold, which we have been accumulating in such boundless measure and, as they think, at their expense, and which they will deeply need and covet. Our very prosperity is making us a tempting prey.

We have not a friend in Europe, unless, perhaps, Belgium. We have donated millions of supplies to every nation on a scale of generosity never dreamed of before; but, nevertheless, all reports prove that we are everywhere disliked. For that I am not disposed to blame them harshly. Engaged in a death struggle, keyed to the highest pitch, unable to see any side but their own, judging everything by its effect on them, a true neutral seems to them an enemy and the rights of neutrals seem only outworn and impractical theories. Then they see us as an exasperating reality, reveling in the luxuries which they think we have gained out of their misery. There is no impulse of friendship to hold them back from attacking us. Is there any other impulse to restrain them? Those conditions which we have always considered as pledges of immunity are all gone. We trusted in the balance of power in Europe; but if one side triumphs now that will be upset. We trusted to international law and the moral opinion of the world and the rights of neutrals; but this war has shattered and destroyed them all. We trusted to 3,000 miles of ocean; but if either side triumphs it can overwhelm our Navy, and then the ocean is an easier and quicker highway than the land. The war has revolutionized both military and moral standards. To obtain respect and fair treatment to-day we must be strong.

I think our danger begins at the moment this war ends, if either side is a victor. I would prepare at once. I think we have delayed too long. I think Congress ought to have met last fall, and by this time the keels of additional battleships should have been laid, submarines put under construction, and the strengthening of our Army begun. We do not want simply to prepare so that we could ultimately win a war; we want to prepare so as to prevent a war, so that no nation will venture to attack us. They know vastly better than we what is adequate preparation. We can not deceive them. So I want our best expert advice, and I am more concerned to see some decisive steps taken quickly than to spend time in laying out a policy extending over years. It will be expensive; but better millions for defense now than billions for tribute later.

But while I would not grudge money for this primal necessity of adequate defense, this insurance against frightful calamity, we ought all the more in other directions to count the cost and try to save. That is where I criticize these estimates submitted by the administration. While our present outlay is daily exceeding our receipts and while enormous increases for defense are recommended, there is no suggestion of economy in our ordinary running expenses. On the contrary, every recommendation is for an increase. We are urged to swell the Agricultural appropriation bill from $22,971,782, which it was last year, to $24,159,089, an increase of $1,187,307; the Diplomatic bill from $4,061,280.01 to $5,426,698.70, an increase of $1,365,418.69; the District bill from $11,859,584.45 to $15,473,676.34, an increase of $3,614,091.89; the Indian bill from $9,771,902.76 to $10,175,036.66, an increase of $403,133.90; the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill from $36,904,799.75 to $39,749,377.25, an increase of $2,844,577.50; the Post Office bill from $313,364,667 to $316,364,879, an increase of $3,000,212; the rivers and harbors bill from $30,000,000 to $44,376,710, an increase of $14,376,710; the sundry civil bill from $126,922,750.79 to $141,181,110.93, an increase of $14,258,360.14; the permanent annual appropriations from $121,567,207 to $135,074,673, an increase of $13,507,466.

That amounts in all to an increase in those bills of $54,557,277.12. Included in that there is recommended for the Panama Canal $7,956,420.83 more than was appropriated last year; and as each Congress must appropriate for that purpose whatever is necessary, I do not hold the administration responsible for that, and I deduct it, leaving $46,600,856.29. That is the increase over last year for which this administration is responsible in these housekeeping bills, and this is a time of stress and the Democrats call themselves the party of economy. The only bill in which they make a saving is the bill for pensions for the old soldiers. They cut that three and a half millions.

There is one singular incident which attracted my attention. The Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report states that "the postal revenues will probably amount to $316,000,000, with expenditures for the Postal Service for the same period under existing laws of $324,000,000." But the estimates for the Post Office appropriation bill were only $316,000,000, and I wondered where that balance of $8,000,000 was taken care of, and I finally found it tucked away in the estimates for permanent appropriations. There is no precedent for placing it there. Why was not the Post Office bill estimated at $324,000,000 instead of $316,000,000? Why was that $8,000,000 hidden under permanent appropriations? I can think of no reason—or, at least none that I care to suggest—and I think it ought to be explained.

In view of this increase all along the line in the recommendations for next year's appropriations, it is interesting to recall that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], in his first formal speech after assuming his new duty as leader of the House, said:

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to show that there is not one word of truth in the charge of Democratic extravagance.

Such statements made by irresponsible stump speakers we are accustomed to, and we ignore. But made by the leader of this House, and made, I suppose, with as much deliberation and cool blood as the gentleman ever experiences, it is entitled to consideration.

What evidence did he give to support his statement? He supported it by two arguments, both of which were erroneous in fact and both faulty in logic. One argument was the the Republicans had voted for all the Democratic appropriations and so were estopped from criticizing them. That argument is erroneous in fact, because the minority did not, in fact, vote for those bills, and it is faulty in logic, because, even if they had, the party in control of Congress was responsible for its acts and could be held to that responsibility by the minority even if they had acquiesced in the action.

The argument of the gentleman of course will have no weight in the House, for every Member knows what he meant and how uncandid he was. He meant not that the Republicans actually voted for the bills, but that because there was no yea-and-nay vote on them those present were presumed, by a fiction of parliamentary law, to vote aye, when there was really no vote at all. To change that fiction into a fact and pretend that because of it Republicans voted for the bill may deceive those outside of this House who do not understand our procedure, but is not very worthy of a party leader. As the gentleman well knows, the fact that the minority does not demand a record vote on appropriation bills does not indicate that they are satisfied with the bills, does not prove that they consider them free from extravagance, and does not estop them from criticism. Indeed, the gentleman's own doctrine of estoppel would prevent his making the argument, for his party for years continually denounced our appropriation bills as extravagant, but still voted for them according to this parliamentary fiction. We, however, were not so unfair and uncandid as to charge them with inconsistency, or blame them for not protecting us against ourselves. The real reason no minority party, as a rule, forces record votes on appropriation bills is that these bills consist of hundreds and thousands of items; they have been fought out item by item in the Committee of the Whole House, where there can be no record vote; that is where the bills are really framed and the contest made; when they come to final passage in the House itself there can be no record vote on the separate items, there can only be a record vote on the bill as a whole; Members who think it extravagant know that the bill must pass in some shape or the wheels of Government will stop, and inasmuch as every appropriation bill is a compromise, and that bill has been thoroughly thrashed out in Committee of the Whole by the House and stamped with its approval, and is not subject to amendment, the minority hardly ever demands a record vote. It recognizes that it is the best compromise which the majority will allow to become a law.

I feel almost ashamed to take the time to state these facts, which are so well known to the Members of the House, but when a person occupying the honorable and responsible position of leader of the majority tries so unfairly to obscure the issue, I think it worth while to make it plain.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. KEATING. I do not like to interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. GILLETT. I am willing, if I have time enough.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman's statement gives the impression that we all acquiesce in what he is saying. He has just stated that no opportunity is given in the House to amend these bills and to secure a record vote. The gentleman does not desire to convey the impression to the country that opportunity is not given for amendment in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, no. That is where they are discussing it, but there can be no record vote there.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman does not intend to convey the impression to the country that a vigilant minority, endeavoring to restrain an extravagant majority, has been in this House offering amendments in Committee of the Whole or in the Committee on Appropriations to cut down these so-called extravagant appropriations?

Mr. GILLETT. Well, I do not know how vigilant the minority has been. I know I have offered a great many amendments to cut down appropriations absolutely without any success.

Mr. KEATING. Has the gentleman offered those amendments in the committee or in the House?

Mr. GILLETT. In the committee; of course, I can not offer them in the House.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman means to say, in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GILLETT. I mean in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KEATING. Has the gentleman offered them in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GILLETT. That is what I meant, in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KEATING. And similar amendments have been offered from the Democratic side?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly; the Democratic side often offer such amendments.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. How much support has the gentleman had from his side on this question?

Mr. GILLETT. I have had more from my side than I have had from the Democratic side.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman will not seriously say that, although he now says it so glibly on the floor. The gentleman knows——

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman can ask a question, of course, he understands.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. GILLETT. But he has no right to interpolate remarks.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no desire to encroach, except I wondered if the gentleman is purporting now to maintain the proposition that the minority in Committee of the Whole has shown a disposition as a minority to hold down expenditures.

Mr. GILLETT. Members of the minority have done so in the Committee of the Whole, but I am not entering into that now. The gentleman, of course, understands that no matter which side is in the majority, the minority always is more inclined to expenditure than the majority, for the reason that the majority is checked on these extravagances by its sense of responsibility. It has the responsibility and has to go out to the country under that responsibility, whereas the minority has no such responsibility, and therefore there is always a tendency for the minority to be more liberal and more careless about expenditures than the majority.

Mr. HAMLIN and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] rose first, and I yield to him; but I must say, Mr. Chairman, unless I can get more time, I can not yield extendedly; otherwise I shall be glad for any discussion.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman a simple question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not the duty of the minority to stop the wheels of Government because the majority is extravagant, is it?

Mr. GILLETT. Of course not.

Mr. SHERLEY. May I ask just one question?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Has the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] who just interrupted been one of those active advocates in supporting his efforts toward economy?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not wish to go into personalities. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GILLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. He does not desire to convey the impression to the country that the minority could not secure a record vote on these propositions if they desired to do so?

Mr. GILLETT. I do. It can not have them on all the propositions. It can have one record vote.

Mr. HAMLIN. On a motion to recommit?

Mr. GILLETT. One record vote.

Mr. HAMLIN. And putting themselves on record as protesting these bills if they want to do it?

Mr. GILLETT. I say that for 20 years, for all those years when your party was in the minority, you did not do it. It is not the custom, of course, to do it, for it is useless.

Mr. RAGSDALE. It is not on the whole question, but on every single amendment that is offered that the minority can get a vote?

Mr. GILLETT. No.

Mr. RAGSDALE. On any amendment that is adopted?

Mr. GILLETT. Any amendment adopted, of course; but they are never adopted. I have offered many an amendment, but never one that was adopted, that I can remember. If they are adopted, we do not care for a record vote, because they go through. If the Committee of the Whole adopts an economical amendment, when it comes to a record vote in the House the chairman of the committee against whose protest that was adopted does not call for a record vote, because he recognizes that the House was in favor of it and there is no use of having a record vote, although it was against his wishes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman each year, on almost every appropriation bill that comes up here for discussion, rises in his place to criticize the majority for increasing expenses. Is it not true, regardless of which party may be in power, that as the Government has grown in the past, under all political parties, increases have gradually been made in the expenses of the Government?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly, that is true; that is fair.

Mr. BARKLEY. And is it not true that such will be the policy in the future so long as this Government continues to grow and not remain standing?

Mr. GILLETT. If it grows and there is no increase in the scale of expenditure, of course there will be still increases in the expenditures, but nothing like the increases that have happened in the last Congress over the preceding Republican Congresses.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman state that the appropriation for increases within the last two years has been greater than the increases in former years?

Mr. GILLETT. I think so.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GILLETT. I will.

Mr. FESS. Can the majority defend itself against the charge of extravagance on the ground that the minority did not prevent it?

Mr. GILLETT. It strikes me like being a baby act. They had a majority of 150 in the last Congress.

Now, that is one argument which the gentleman from North Carolina presented. The other argument which the gentleman submitted to show that his party was not extravagant was that "the Wilson administration and Democratic Congress appropriated for its first year $17,258,000 less than for the last year of the Taft administration, and for the last year—this fiscal year—over $10,000,000 less." That, he thinks, is sufficient proof of economy. I suppose the trouble is that the gentleman from North Carolina has lived in the atmosphere of the Ways and Means Committee, and when a Democrat deals with the tariff he enters a realm of fancy and imagination and unreality and loses his capacity to deal with real facts and figures. So it is not strange that the gentleman is mistaken in his figures and has entirely omitted certain pertinent comparisons, which, in the interest of abstract truth, I shall endeavor to supply.

In the first place, the gentleman is wrong in his figures. The clerks of the Appropriation Committee have made the computation and find that the true difference between 1914 and 1915 is $10,549,045.85, and I have more confidence in their accuracy than in that of the gentleman from North Carolina. He has made a little mistake of $7,000,000 in his subtraction.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course the question of extravagance is a relative one.

Mr. GILLETT. I am coming to that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether at this time he could state to the House the actual cash balance in the Treasury to-day which could be drawn upon to pay any current obligation of the Government?

Mr. GILLETT. I can not state exactly. I suppose it is about $40,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is that all the available cash that would be subject to draft at any time?

Mr. GILLETT. I have not looked at it for a few days. I should think it was about that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Now, can the gentleman state whether there are any outstanding obligations of the Government to-day that have not been paid?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Lots of them, from the Republican administration. They will not be paid for 10 years.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If they were paid, what would the balance be in the Treasury?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The country would be bankrupt if we paid all the obligations from public funds.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course you would.

Mr. GILLETT. Returning to my argument, if the comparison of the gentleman from North Carolina were a fair one—and it is not—still it would fall far short of establishing his case. I will judge him simply by Democratic standards. "Frightful extravagance" and "lavish waste" were the phrases used in the last two Democratic national platforms to characterize Republican appropriations. A reduction from $813,000,000 in the last year of the Taft administration to $802,000,000 in the first year of the Wilson administration, a reduction of a little over 1 per cent, would hardly be called a change from "frightful extravagance" to "that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government," as demanded by their platform.

That is a reduction of $11,000,000 in a total expense of $800,000,000, and it would not be generally considered, it seems to me, a change from "frightful extravagance" and "lavish waste" to that strict economy which is supposed to be the prerogative of the Democratic Party. It is a reduction of a little over 1 per cent. That is hardly a change from the epithets which they used toward us to the encomiums they apply to themselves.

Mr. GORDON. Right there, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GILLETT. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. GORDON. Has the gentleman any figures available that would enable him to put in the RECORD a statement of the amount of continuing appropriations which in the last year of the Taft administration were fastened on its successor and the subsequent Congress?

Mr. GILLETT. I have not it in my head, but it is very easy to get.

Mr. GORDON. It was a very large sum, was it not?

Mr. GILLETT. Well, each Congress puts on a large sum.

Mr. GORDON. Was it not an exceptionally large sum?

Mr. GILLETT. I presume it was, because in the last year of the Taft administration this House was controlled by the Democrats. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GORDON. Of course, there was no way by which the Sixty-third Congress could evade those appropriations that were imposed on us, was there?

Mr. GILLETT. No; because, as I say, the Democratic Party controlled the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GORDON. Let me ask the gentleman one more question. Is it not a fact that the Senate and Mr. Taft himself added enormously to the appropriations made by the House in the Sixty-second Congress?

Mr. GILLETT. I will never undertake to claim that the Senate, no matter what party controls it, will ever be economical. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. Well, the Republicans controlled the Senate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. It does not now.

Mr. GORDON. Did not Mr. Taft threaten to veto the sundry civil bill if they did not add a lot of public buildings to it?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think so.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman will not dispute it. It is a fact and was asserted on the floor of this House by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and has not been disputed by anyone. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. I will dispute it now. [Applause on the Republican side.]

As I say, this reduction of 1¼ per cent was not a reduction of which a party can be very proud. It reminds me of the statement which a very distinguished Democrat made when he came before the Committee on Appropriations in the first year of the Wilson administration. He was Secretary of State, and he said he had made up his mind that there was one department of the Government that should show a reduction in cost over its predecessor, and the State Department's estimates were $120 less than those of the Republican administration. [Laughter on the Republican side.] That is about the scale of economies which the Democratic Party can suggest when they are driven to show a record.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. No; I can not yield any more. Well, yes; I will yield to my chairman. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I just wanted to say that the bill——

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, I refuse to yield except for a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman, my colleague, should not bandy my name around when he is——

Mr. GILLETT. I am not doing that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. GILLETT. You can put it in the RECORD when you please, but you can not put it in now. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thank the gentleman, but I please to put it in now. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. You can not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I will.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I demand order. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GILLETT. But let us look further at this comparison, which the gentleman from North Carolina adduces as the only and sufficient proof of Democratic economy, and see if it is a fair one. He omits the Post Office bill for both years. The Post Office bill in 1914 was $285,000,000 and in 1915 was $313,000,000, $28,000,000 larger. If you do not omit these bills, the appropriations of the first Democratic Congress were $17,000,000 larger than its predecessor. He says Post Office bills are "always excluded." That is a novel and guileless proposition. If he had said Democrats always omitted them when it would be to their advantage, it might be true. But Democrats have not omitted them unless the omission helped. Democrats did not omit them when they ran a campaign on the issue of a billion-dollar Congress. If they had excluded them, it would have ruined their catch phrase, so they never thought of the justice of it. They did not omit them in their national platform before the last, when they stated and condemned the total of the Republican appropriations. But now, when it is to his advantage, the gentleman excludes them.

Extravagance can show itself in Post Office appropriations as well as elsewhere. Extravagance is apt to show itself in increase of salaries, and nowhere were salaries so increased in 1915 as in the Post Office bill which the gentleman excludes. If the gentleman did not omit the Post Office bills, both the 1915 and 1916 appropriations would be much larger than 1914, and the gentleman's argument would be gone.

But let us adopt his method, only let us carry it a little further, and let us omit not only the Post Office bills from both years but other appropriation bills for whose size everyone will admit Congress was not responsible. I rather wondered at first why the gentleman selected this one year, 1914, for his comparison with both the Democratic sessions. You expect a leader to be fair. But I find that the year 1914 had the enormous pension appropriations of $195,000,000, while in 1915 the pension bill was only $169,000,000. There was a saving of $26,000,000, but that was due to no volition of Congress, no change of the law, no Democratic economy, but to the death of old soldiers. A pension appropriation bill differs from all others because Congress exercises no discretion except to estimate how many pensioners will be alive. The law determines what each shall receive, and unless they change the law—and that has not been done since 1913—the pension bill offers no opportunity for economy, but it simply appropriates the amounts the law calls for, and unless appropriations were made in 1914 which really belonged in 1913, the only reason 1915 should be smaller than 1914 was that it was estimated some thousands of the veterans would be dead and need no pensions. Should you get credit for that? Was that part of your scheme of economy? There was $26,000,000 less required for pensions in 1915 than in 1914, and if you take that out in your comparison as you do the Post Office bills, because you were in no wise responsible for it, then both the first and second Democratic sessions spent over $15,000,000 more than the last session of the Taft Congress. And yet the gentleman claims that there is not one word of truth in the charge of Democratic extravagance.

In all the other branches of expenditure, outside of this pension bill, the Sixty-third Congress was more extravagant than the Sixty-second. How, then, can the gentleman say there is no extravagance when he insists Republicans were always extravagant—particularly as the pension law which compelled this enormous appropriation in 1914 originated in and was passed by a Democratic House?

There is another of the appropriation bills which the gentleman might have considered in his search for Democratic economy. The river and harbor bill of 1914 was $41,000,000. The river and harbor bill of 1915 was $20,000,000—so that bill made a saving of $21,000,000 for the first year of the Democratic administration over its predecessor. But is the Democratic Party entitled to that credit? Was that economy due to their wish and action? The Democratic President recommended a river and harbor appropriation of $34,000,000. The Democratic House passed a bill for $39,000,000. It went to the Senate, and the Democratic Senate committee reported it for $43,000,000. Why did it not pass? Was it because of Democratic economy? It failed because Senator Burton, a Republican, led a filibuster against it, and by the power which the Senate rules give the individual Member that little band brought the Democratic majority to their knees and reduced the bill to $20,000,000. And the gentleman is claiming that reduction as an evidence of Democratic economy. If the bill had become a law, even as your Democratic House passed it, which was its most diminutive form, then on your own basis of comparison the first Democratic Congress would have exceeded its predecessor by about $8,000,000, and your claim of economy would be gone. But a Republican filibuster in the Senate made that economy for you.

And if, in making the comparison between the sessions of Congress which you have selected, in addition to the Post Office bill you omit the pension bill and the saving made in the Senate by the Republican filibuster, for which the Democratic Party certainly can claim no credit, then the appropriations of the first session of the Democratic administration exceeded those of the last session of the Taft administration by $34,000,000. And the gentleman claims that this comparison refutes all charges of Democratic extravagance.

I admit that literally the Democratic Party is entitled to the credit of the Republican filibuster. The party in power is responsible for the acts of the Congress which it controls. If by happy accidents or the acts of the minority good legislation comes, the majority can properly claim it, just as it can be properly blamed for bad luck. The results accomplished by a Congress are the fruits by which the majority party must be judged, no matter how the majority was composed which passed each particular bill. It is most important that this sense of party responsibility should be strictly preserved. I would not diminish it or impair it. But when the gentleman, in his comparison, begins to omit appropriation bills on grounds of equity, the process can be carried further, and it can be shown just how much the Democrats really contributed to economy.

So far I have followed the line of comparison which the gentleman himself initiated. But I deny that he selected a fair basis for comparison. He argues that the method of determining whether a Democratic Congress is extravagant is to ascertain if it spent more than a Republican Congress, and then he proceeds to compare it with a Congress which was only half Republican. In disproving Democratic extravagance why should he compare the Democratic Party with itself? Why should he not compare its conduct with that of the party which they have always maintained furnished a standard of "frightful extravagance" and "profligate waste"? That would be the true comparison. In the year 1914, which the gentleman picked out for his comparison, Congress was not controlled by the Republicans. This House, which originates all the appropriation bills, was Democratic. The Senate, to be sure, was Republican; but I trust it is not unparliamentary or unfair to say that in my experience here I have learned never to look to the Senate for economy, no matter which party controls there. If there is to be economy, it must start and stop here. But if the gentleman had taken both the sessions of the Sixty-second Congress, which was half Republican, and compared them with both of the sessions of the Democratic Sixty-third Congress instead of selecting the session which made the best showing for his purpose, the result would have been very different. The appropriations of the Sixty-third Congress exceeded that of the Sixty-second by $112,963,651.26. Excluding all post-office bills, the appropriations of the Sixty-third Congress exceeded those of the Sixty-second by $43,040,187.26. And as the gentleman's only evidence that the Sixty-third Congress was not extravagant was that each of its sessions had spent less than one session of the Sixty-second Congress, when we find that, comparing the two sessions of the Sixty-third with the two sessions of the Sixty-second, according to his own select method of bookkeeping, the Democratic Congress appropriated $43,000,000 more than its predecessor, his only prop falls from under him. And I ask, was it fair, in comparing both sessions of the Sixty-third Congress with the Sixty-second, to pick out only one session of the Sixty-second Congress when, if you had taken both sessions, the result would have been so entirely different?

But even that comparison favors him unduly, for the Sixty-second Congress was half Democratic. To find out how much the Democrats have improved over the party which for 12 years they held up as the exemplar of extravagance let us compare the record of their first Congress, the Sixty-third, with the last Congress controlled by the Republicans, the Sixty-first. That is the natural and the fair comparison. The appropriations of the Sixty-first Congress were $2,054,584,510.90, and the appropriations of the Sixty-third Congress were $2,239,055,150.57; so the Sixty-third exceeded the Sixty-first by $176,470,639.67. If you exclude the post-office bills, as the gentleman desires, the Sixty-third exceeds the Sixty-first by $52,782,788.67. But if it is fair to exclude the post-office bills, it is certainly fair to exclude the amount devoted to the Panama Canal, for Congress exercised no discretion there. The Sixty-first Congress spent more on the canal than the Sixty-third by $44,993,426.70. So excluding both the postal and the canal expenses the Sixty-third exceeded the Sixty-first by $97,776,215.37. Either method of figuring disposes of the gentleman's argument that the Sixty-third Congress was economical compared with its Republican predecessor. If you include all the appropriations, the last Democratic Congress spent $176,000,000 more than the last Republican Congress. If you omit the appropriations for the Postal Service and for the Panama Canal, it spent $97,000,000 more.

I do not claim that the Sixty-third Congress was necessarily extravagant because it appropriated more than any of its predecessors. But that is the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina. He offers as conclusive proof that the Democratic Congress was not extravagant the fact that it spent less than the previous Congress, which was only half Democratic; and he is not even correct or fair or candid in that comparison. He does not dare to make the comparison with any of the Congresses when the Republicans had complete control because the results would be so disastrous for him. I do not think that the mere fact that a Congress spent more than its predecessor proves that it was extravagant. Personally I do not think that the Republican administrations were very economical.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman give me five minutes more?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not claim for the Republican administrations great economy, although they did not deserve the abuse heaped on them by the Democrats, but they certainly were economical compared with their Democratic successor. And if they made large appropriations they at least provided the money to meet them. That is where I specially condemn the present administration. The mere amount of money spent does not prove extravagance. The proportion of income to outgo must be considered. What is parsimony in a millionaire might be waste in a pauper. What was reasonable expenditure in good Republican times might be rank extravagance in lean Democratic years.

Last winter, when our outgo was steadily gaining on our income, when every month showed a growing deficiency, when there was no prospect of any change, when private individuals everywhere were cutting down expenses, the President recommended and the Congress adopted larger appropriations than had ever been passed by any previous Congress. That I call extravagance—not simply on the ground which ought to estop any Democrat from denying it, that the appropriations were vastly larger than those of any Republican Congress, but on the ground that no provision of income was made to meet their large appropriations. The outlook was stormy; there was every reason for trying to retrench and set aside reserve resources, and yet in the face of these conditions you went on spending lavishly for current expenses and frittering away the surplus which had been provided by Republican savings. And now we are reaping the natural result. Now we are facing inevitable and increased expenses. The surplus of $150,000,000, or according to present bookkeeping of $200,000,000, which this administration found in the Treasury would have gone far to meet them if it had not been wasted. And yet even now, when the President recommends to us enormous outlays for armed defense, he does not offer a single suggestion of economy or show that he is conscious of the fact that money can be provided by cutting off expenses as well as by increasing revenues.

The Democratic Party has so long been in the minority and been reproaching us for extravagance that I suspect it deceived itself into believing that it really represented the spirit of economy. But the conduct of our finances the past two years ought to have destroyed that illusion. A few leaders may still make a pretense, but I do not think the intelligent voters who form public opinion in both parties can longer be deceived. They will not believe a party which continually denounces its opponent for extravagance and then when it achieves power itself increases enormously the very appropriation which it had so unsparingly condemned. The Democratic Party is either extravagant now or it was unjust and demagogical before. It can choose either horn of the dilemma. But it can no longer convince any impartial judge that its conduct conforms to the statements of its leaders or the pledges of its platform. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think it is the hope of all students of government that the time will come in all Congresses when candor will be the most predominant trait in men who speak about public affairs. Unfortunately every four years this country is subjected to a lot of speeches that are made simply with a view of the presidential election, and without that virtue of candor being especially prominent.

I do not believe that any man who has ever considered the workings of the American Congress but what has come to one conclusion, and that certainly is also the conclusion of the American people, that irrespective of the tendencies of respective parties, the method of making appropriations in the National Congress inevitably leads to extravagance [applause], and men who want to be candid instead of being political will so state.

No man who has served on the Committee on Appropriations, as has the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts and myself, but what knows that fact. They know that that committee comes to this floor repeatedly with bills by which they undertake to make a saving; but that there is pressure both before the bill is reported and after it is reported by Members on both sides of the aisle for additional expenditure of money that makes their efforts for economy of little avail.

Anyone can very easily cite expenditures under any party that show extravagance, but if they are frank they will say that, speaking by and large, there is no disposition on the part of the individual Member to help along the lines of economy, particularly if the subject matter happens to relate to his section of the country. That is the plain truth; and yet we all play politics, we all try to get advantages from the analysis and comparison of the statements of expenditures of one Congress with another, though we know that as long as we have the present system we will have increases of expenditure. Practically every congress in the world has found that in order to curb extravagance they had to take away from the individual member of the congress the right to increase estimates of appropriations as submitted by the administrative officers in control.

There is another thing touching expenditures and touching extravagance, and that is as to whether you shall consider simply totals as evidence of extravagance or whether you should consider what they were spent for and how they were spent. There comes in the life of every nation the need to do many things that must increase expenditures, and nothing is more shortsighted than to undertake to determine extravagance and economy simply by a mathematical determination of totals.

There recently has been much that has developed by new men taking hold of the departments as to the needs of the departments touching the physical property of the Government. That probably would have been true if Republicans had succeeded Democrats. I can cite instance after instance in connection with the Coast and Geodetic Survey, in connection with the Bureau of Fisheries, and other departments, where the physical property of the Government had reached the point that it required to be replaced and new put in its stead. Those things come about whenever you get a change from one set of officials long in power to another and without regard to parties. I am not saying this simply to offset any political advantage the gentleman from Massachusetts may get from his political speech, but because I am interested in having the people of America consider the real matters that underly extravagance in government.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; briefly.

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman's defense against the charge of extravagance stand also for the charge of his party in its platform against the extravagance of the Republican Party?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the gentleman's question. In the first place, I am neither trying to make a defense or an attack. I am trying to state what is so rarely done during times of political agitation, namely, the facts that everyone knows and few admit publicly. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to continue a short time longer, and I will ask the gentleman from New York to yield me a little more time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that I am in accord and sympathize with what the gentleman has said; but I call attention to the fact that my remarks were made in answer to and in exposition of, as I thought, the lack of candor on the part of the leader of the Democratic Party and the leaders of this House.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am perfectly willing to admit that the gentleman agrees pretty largely with me except when he is making a political speech. I concede that now. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] I desire to say this: I agree thoroughly with the idea that a party in power must stand sponsor for what is done, but I also wish that, along with that responsibility, there could be means for making it a real responsibility, which do not exist at the present time. We all know that the method of appropriations does not in a practical sense, though it does in a theoretical sense, give to the majority party in power control over expenditures. That is one of the reasons I have been fighting for something of a budget system in our Government. It is one of the reasons why I believe that, irrespective of parties, you will not get any real remedy as long as you proceed in the present way.

Now, just a word touching the matter of revenues, Mr. Chairman, and I am through. The gentleman from Massachusetts seems to lay great stress on the fact that the Democratic Party fails to raise sufficient revenues to run the Government. That, I think, could be met simply by the statement that the facts do not warrant the assertion, but what underlies his remark, and what constantly underlies the remarks of men on his side of the Chamber, is that we do not hide the methods by which we tax the people as successfully as the Republicans do. [Laughter.] They seem to think that there is a virtue in taxing through a customhouse and a vice in taxing in any other way. I know it has been frequently said that the height of statesmanship lies in taxing the people without their knowing it. That is unfortunately largely true as to political success, but with respect to political morality it is the most vicious proposition that was ever presented to a free people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The truth of the business is that taxation is taxation, whether it comes from the customhouse or by levy of a direct tax; but the individual, when he pays a direct tax, having it brought home to him, complains, because all men like privileges and dislike obligations. When taxation comes, however, through the customhouse he is not conscious of it—it rarely can be traced—and you do not have the protest. One of the greatest statesman that England ever produced said that you could tax the coat off a man's back without protest if you did it by indirect methods, and, reviewing the history of this country at several periods, I am inclined to think the statement was not an exaggeration.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Is the gentleman willing to supersede the indirect taxation methods through the customhouse by the direct method?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am both willing to supersede or to increase them according as the circumstances may warrant. Do not say that is evasion. I mean it in this sense: I would not levy a tax at the customhouse simply to evade letting the people know they were paying a tax. I would levy taxes at the customhouse where I thought the subject taxed was a proper one to be taxed—a legitimate method of raising revenue.

What I resent is the constant assumption that there is some peculiar virtue in hiding a tax and a peculiar vice in letting it be known. That is the thing that leads to extravagance. Why is it that your average State legislature does not spend money so easily as the Congress of the United States does? Why is it that all of the States, talking State rights, and forgetting State obligations, are coming here with demands for new Federal activities? I will tell you why. It is because if those activities are undertaken by the States it means increased taxation that shows in the tax rate when the citizen goes to pay his taxes, and so they begin to ask whether the thing they are paying for is worth the price paid; but they come up here, hide the fact that governmental activities mean governmental expenses and taxation, and expect to get away with it, and one of the very reasons why you are seeing thrown upon the Federal Government such a tremendous amount of work that ought to be done in the communities back home is because of the hiding of the fact that governmental activities cost money. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I regret that I can not yield further.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CARTER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 4716. An act to authorize Dunklin County, Mo., and Clay County, Ark., to construct a bridge across St. Francis River; and

H. R. 6448. An act to authorize Butler and Dunklin Counties, Mo., to construct a bridge across St. Francis River.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] in his usually fair and candid way, rather more than fair, I think, considering the class of alleged argument that he has to meet and answer, has discussed some of the faults of this administration and Congress touching appropriations. I think that in general debate we should, as far as possible, confine the discussion, as the gentleman did, to the subject matter of the bill. Just at this time, however, there is another question than that of appropriations attracting wide public attention, relative to which there is a great deal of discussion, to wit, the Mexican situation, and, owing to the importance of that question, I beg leave of the House to discuss for a few minutes in connection with the consideration of this bill.

THE MEXICAN SITUATION.

The administration's Mexican policy has again borne logical, horrid, and humiliating fruit in the fiendish murder of nearly a score of American citizens at Santa Ysabel, and the only answer of the administration to this fresh evidence of brutish ferocity toward American citizens, and utter contempt of the American Government among the bandit forces of Mexico, is a polite note to Carranza to please apprehend and punish the offenders.

This fresh outbreak of hate and ferocity has aroused the country more perhaps than any of the long line of outrages and murders committed on our people in Mexico during this administration. But dastardly and deplorable as was the murder of these American mining men, journeying on a business mission, it had no aspect or element of horror which had not had its counterpart in the repeated outrages and murders of American men and women, in their homes in Mexico, which have occurred during the past three years.

Some of the comments and suggestions which this latest outrage have brought forth are, taking into consideration what has gone before, curious and significant. Gentlemen are now getting into the lists with severest denunciation who have heretofore held their peace during the development of the policy which produced, prolonged, and multiplied these outrages and murders.

We are now hearing caustic comment from some of those who have been the most unctuous and emphatic in thanking God for Wilson and meeting all adverse criticism of the administration's policy by denouncing all who have plead or protested against it as wicked partisans, pestiferous trouble makers, or bloodthirsty advocates of armed intervention.

Some who have alternately apologized for or defended the administration policy because it has, so they say, "kept us out of war," are now most anxious that Congress shall assume all responsibility, for the situation the administration policies have produced, and relieve the administration from all past and present blame by having Congress do what they have applauded the administration for not doing or proposing. Some have gone so far along this road as to offer the pusillanimous and humiliating suggestion that we invite other nations to join and assist us in avenging and defending our own people and restoring our shattered prestige in Mexico.

FIXING THE RESPONSIBILITY.

In the midst of these counsels of belated and strangely blended belligerency and timidity, of avoidance and apology, whatever is done, or may be necessary to do, should be done in full and complete appreciation, and recognition of, what has heretofore been done and left undone and of the proper responsibility for it.

Unless responsibility for what has occurred is clearly understood and definitely fixed, the acts of commission and omission, which have wrought so lamentable a condition of loss of prestige and respect in Mexico, which have brought our Government and flag into contempt and subjected our people to every conceivable insult, outrage, and violence, may, when these outrages are dimmed or forgotten, be used as precedents for like policies in the future. Policies of unjustifiable interference or unseemly alliance with factions of other nations, and supine indifference to, and deliberate neglect of, our duty to our own citizens or those whose protection we assume as the sponsor for the Monroe doctrine.

In the presence of these fresh manifestations of outlawry in Mexico, and of hatred toward our citizens and contempt of our power, let it be remembered that these and similar occurrences are the inevitable fruit and outcome of the policy the administration has with stiff-necked persistency pursued from the beginning, and that these outrages have had their genesis and development out of definite acts and purposes of the administration, even more than as the result of its vacillation, timidity, and seeming indifference.

The administration has not only failed to take prompt, decisive, and determined action for the protection of American life and property and the punishment of outrages; it has deliberately adopted a policy and pursued a line of action which brought upon our people the suspicion, ill will, and hatred of first one, then another, and finally all of the factions in Mexico, which, ripening into contempt, developed into outrage and murder.

DELIBERATE DESERTION.

More than this, the administration has exposed our people in Mexico to mortal danger, and by deliberate act deserted and abandoned them to insult, outrage, and danger of death in the fatuous pursuit of its indefensible policy. If anyone challenges the truth or accuracy of this charge, let him recall the occurrences at Tampico in the days immediately following our taking of Vera Cruz.

In the excitement of that time, when the wildest tales and rumors of occurrences at Vera Cruz were being circulated among the Mexicans in and about the oil fields of Tampico, several hundred American men, women, and children, leaving their homes and property, gathered at Tampico, expecting to find safety there under the guns of American warships. As the story of our taking of Vera Cruz and the killing of several hundred Mexicans spread in Tampico an angry, tumultuous mob gathered around the hotel where most of the Americans were quartered and began heaping upon them threats and insults.

At this juncture, upon peremptory orders from Washington, the American commander reluctantly withdrew his ship, which lay along the wharf with shotted guns and ready for action, and sailed out into the open roadstead, where lay six American battleships, leaving our people defenseless and at the mercy of an armed, angry, infuriated, and drunken mob.

The story of the nameless and unprintable insults heaped upon that little band of Americans, directed at American men in the presence of their wives and children, as related to me by one who bore, witnessed, and heard them, are calculated to make one's blood boil. They almost justified the impassioned declaration of that humiliated and exasperated citizen that he never could again respect his country's flag or think or speak with patience or patriotism of the Government at Washington.

SAVED BY A GERMAN CAPTAIN.

Fortunately for that harassed and beleaguered little band there lay in the harbor of Tampico the German gunboat Dresden, and her commander, without invitation or request of our authorities, trained his guns upon Tampico, served notice of his intent to use them if injury or further insult were attempted, and escorted our people—men, women, and children—to the wharf, where they were loaded on English and German boats and taken out of danger.

That April day strikes me as being one of the darkest in American history. That unspeakably infamous desertion was a deliberate part and parcel of the administration's policy, and was purposed and effected out of fear that the protection of our citizens might bring on a clash with the Mexicans, result in the joining of the two Mexican forces—the one defending and the other attacking Tampico—and thus interfere with the President's plan and purpose to crush and defeat the Huerta government.

KEYNOTE OF ADMINISTRATION'S POLICY.

In this infamous incident we have the keynote of the administration's policy in Mexico, a policy of personal antagonism and antipathy to an individual Mexican, of interference with the sovereign right of Mexico to manage its own affairs and fight out its quarrels without let or hindrance; to have or maintain such government, or lack of government, as suits its people, or is tolerated by them, so long as foreign lives and property are secured and protected.

POLICY OF PREJUDICE AND INTERFERENCE.

Out of the establishment, pursuit, and continuance of its policy of prejudice and interference, of alternating impertinence and apology, bluffs and vacillation, bolstered with a flood of contradictory declarations, discourse, and phrase making, have come the major part of the losses, insults, and outrages which our people in Mexico have suffered, and the spread and continuation of the reign of unspeakable demoralization and anarchy which has deluged that unhappy country.

The losses and wrongs suffered by Americans under a former administration during the revolution led by Madero were not only incomparably less frequent, widespread, or ferocious than those which have been suffered under the present administration, but they were of altogether different character. Those were, without exception, the class of occurrences inseparably connected with a condition of revolution and of the breaking down of civil government. They were not generally crimes against Americans as such, but the ordinary crimes of lawless and criminal bands or persons in the absence of restraining authority. The major portion of the innumerable lootings, confiscations, insults, outrages, and murder of Americans since this administration took control of affairs have, at least the most atrocious of them, been directed against Americans because they were Americans. They have been prompted and inspired out of exasperation over the attitude and acts of interference on the part of the American Government, and contempt born of the administration's acts of deliberate desertion of and abject failure to protect Americans in Mexico.

THE WAR AGAINST HUERTA.

The recognition of the government of Huerta as the de facto government in Mexico would not have been an absolute essential if a sound, sane, and sensible policy had otherwise been adopted. Such recognition in due and proper time would, however, have been in accordance with our uniform diplomatic practice for a century and in harmony with the subsequent practice of this administration in Peru and Haiti. In fact, it is the opinion of those well informed that the administration had no other thought or purpose for a considerable period of time than the ultimate official recognition of the fact that the Huerta government did control the machinery of government and the major portion of the territory of Mexico.

While, however, the Secretary of State journeyed the Chautauqua circuit busybodies and self-seekers brought to the ear of the President statements and rumors of uncomplimentary references alleged to have been made by Huerta to his intimates, or in convivial moments not so privately, relative to the President of the United States. Among these rumors was one that Huerta had expressed the opinion that he would be President of Mexico longer than Mr. Wilson would be President of the United States. Whereupon, or at least immediately thereafter, a complete change came over the spirit of the administration. The period of "watchful waiting" came to an end and the determination was entered upon not to recognize the Huerta government, but to destroy it and eliminate Huerta from all consideration as the head of the government in Mexico.

Smug and unctious phrases and elaborate dissertations on the cardinal virtues, and the blessings of constitutional government, were framed and fashioned in excuse of this indefensible interference with the sovereignty of an independent people, with their right to tolerate, their right to choose or select whom they saw fit. That interference, bolstered with the prayer of the Pharisee, cost us the respect of Mexicans who value the sovereignty and the independence of their Government; brought us the open enmity of all who favored the Huerta régime; the covert distrust and suspicion of even those who temporarily benefited by our act and attitude.

Even then, and to the day of its downfall, the Huerta government wherever it had the power, and with remarkable effectiveness in all the territory it controlled, protected our people and other foreigners. On the contrary, those whose cause the administration had thus openly espoused, the Villaistas, the Zapatistas, the Carranzistas, made but a feeble and perfunctory attempt to protect our people, and carefully avoided any danger of testing or losing the loyalty of their outlying irregular and robber bands by any honest or earnest effort to control or prevent their lootings, outrage, and murder.

WHEN THE ADMINISTRATION INTERVENED.

Those who are belatedly aroused by the rising tide of public indignation are now clamoring to Congress for action rather than appealing to the White House. Have they overlooked the fact that the White House has the first and initial responsibility in our foreign relations? Have they forgotten that the White House can and has at one time acted vigorously relative to Mexico, culminating in the taking of Vera Cruz? That action was not, it is true, in defense of American lives and property. It was not, it is true, in response to the agonized cries of outraged and plundered Americans, or the mute appeal of American blood wantonly and criminally spilled. Every fact and circumstance surrounding that action evidences that it was taken because at that time the sole and single purpose of the administration's policy, the defeat of Huerta, might be further advanced by it.

Out of an incident, trivial in character, involving the formal placing in custody for an hour and a half of a small party of American sailors, in which no insult was offered or intended, not even a temper or uniform ruffled, came the request to Congress to be permitted to us the armed forces of the United States. Before Congress granted that permission our mighty fleet moved and our heroic men took Vera Cruz. Nineteen of them, just the number of those cruelly murdered the other day at Santa Ysabel, lost their lives that Huerta, who had protected American citizens, might be defeated. The next day our harassed and hunted countrymen, their wives and little ones, their lives placed in jeopardy by reason of the taking of Vera Cruz, were cruelly and wickedly abandoned, as I have stated, to the tender mercies of a Mexican mob. Their protection might in some degree have interfered with the President's determination to defeat Huerta.

FRIEND AND ALLY OF VILLA.

Continuing a plan of personal vengeance, ignoring past American practice in international intercourse, an embargo was laid against arms going to the government at Mexico City and its forces, while we flung wide open the gates of our northern border in aid and encouragement of the shipment of arms and ammunitions to the revolutionary forces in northern Mexico. In all probability we furnished the very guns and cartridges with which our defenseless citizens were recently foully slain at Santa Ysabel. The agents and emissaries, official and unofficial, of the administration kotowed to, hobnobbed and fraternized with, Villa and all his chieftains. Administration journals proclaimed Villa the only true patriot and the hope of liberty in Mexico. In the meanwhile Villa, through his subordinates, looted and confiscated the property of native and foreigner alike, and through his relatives and henchmen conducted or absorbed the profits of brothels and gambling dens. Outwardly he expressed friendship for and promised to protect Americans, and, no doubt, made some slight effort in that direction; but his control over his bandit bands in outlying districts was slight, and he declined to imperil or sacrifice their loyalty by limiting their lootings or adequately punishing their crimes. He realized his security against anything more than polite half-apologetic demands for the protection of Americans, and punishment of those guilty of outrage, lay in the fact that the administration could not afford to proceed to extreme measures against its chief ally in its campaign to defeat Huerta.

DESERTED VILLA, EMBRACED CARRANZA.

The administration's purpose to eliminate Huerta having been accomplished, and the reign of terror and chaos, of rapine and murder, having widely extended, there came the inevitable break between Villa and Carranza. Then, again the administration's fatuous and fatal policy of taking sides as an active ally, of intervening on behalf of, one of the forces in Mexico. Carranza, profiting as he did by our attitude toward the Huerta government, always resented that attitude as an unwarranted and impertinent interference with Mexican affairs. While taking advantage of our intervention against Huerta, he refused at all times our patronizing advances, but unquestionably did make some attempt to protect the lives and property of foreigners in the territory he controlled.

I am not disposed to criticize the recognition of Carranza's government, irregular, revolutionary, unconstitutional, and comparatively ineffectual as it is. The rule long since adopted as our guide in such matters is to recognize—at least to enter into official relations with—such government as at the time is or most nearly approximates the de facto government of a country, providing it be in position and evidence an inclination and disposition to fulfill its international obligations. Assuming that the Carranza government, among those exercising authority in Mexico, most nearly measured up to these requirements, and had given satisfactory assurances of its inclination and intent, the duty of recognition for the purpose of being in position to best protect our citizens rested with the administration. In the recognition of Carranza, however, the administration gave the clearest and most convincing proof of the indefensible character of its refusal to recognize the government of Huerta and of the hollow insincerity of its declarations that no government in Mexico would ever be recognized which did not have constitutional basis for its authority.

MEASURELESS INCONSISTENCY.

The Spanish mind is untrained in the diplomatic gymnastics of this administration and unable to follow the limitless and labyrinthian allocutions through which the administration demonstrates that what it detested, abhorred, and abjured last summer or last week is law and gospel to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.] They are unaccustomed to accept a phrase as a substitute for a fact, and do not move quickly to a realization that you may properly, logically, or honestly do to-day that which on yesterday you called on high heaven to witness you would never do. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Huerta—

Said they—

was, according to our laws and usages, entitled to at least claim the constitutionality of his government, though many of us deny its unquestioned constitutional character. But Carranza makes no claim, nor anyone for him, that his government is anything but revolutionary, and your President has theretofore declared that under no circumstances would any government be recognized that had not a constitutional basis.

TURNING ON VILLA.

Until we recognized Carranza Villa believed he would have a free hand, so far as we were concerned, to fight it out. He had not expected to be recognized as the head of government. He had the President's word that no one else would until some arrangement, at least nominally constitutional, could be had. But suddenly the administration, whose pet he had been, whose encouragement he had received, even after his break with Carranza, deserted him, and he found himself handicapped by the recognition of his rival. But Pancho Villa, with all his faults, appears to have some soldierly philosophy, and to have accepted with considerable self-restraint the conditions, which, in view of former assurances, he might properly have felt were thus unfairly created.

This, however, was but the beginning, for embargo on arms to Villa forces followed Carranza's recognition; our special representatives, Villa's erstwhile companions and compatriots, deserted him, and every device of restraint and embargo at our command was used against him. Even all this, while it led to violent outbreaks of protest, did not, it seems, wholly turn Villa against us and make him and his followers the open and sworn enemies of our people.

Against the handicaps and hardships we had raised against him Villa fought on against the Carranza forces, and seizing the opportunity while Carranza forces at Agua Prieta were less than his he planned a dashing campaign against them, believing there was no way that the Carranza garrison could be quickly reinforced. Stripped of the last ounce of surplus supplies or impedimenta, by forced marches over a barren country, Villa and his little force pressed on, and after incredible hardship, worn, hungry, tortured with thirst, a ragged remnant reached the outskirts of Agua Prieta; reached their goal only to find themselves confronted with several thousand fresh Carranza troops, who had been transported with their arms and accouterments over American territory by rail, while his men had been trailing through the desert. There they lay, well fortified in the trenches of Agua Prieta behind American barbed-wire entanglements, well provisioned from American sources, to meet his famished, thirst-tortured troops.

WHEN VILLA TURNED.

Had the men thus confronting the erstwhile victorious constitutional leader been Americans the shock could not have been greater or our open hostility more apparent. And yet, against all these odds, he fought valiantly and only gave up the fight when hunger and thirst and decimation of his forces made further attack impossible. Then Villa took to the hills, and his followers, in looting, murderous bands, took up the work that culminated in the gruesome horror of Santa Ysabel.

Thus by following, not a policy of "watchful waiting," but of mischievous meddling and impertinent interference, coupled with base betrayal and calloused indifference to the welfare and safety of American citizens, has the administration lost the respect and the confidence, and earned the contempt, of first one and then another and finally all the people of Mexico. By the same process has the administration subjected our citizens in Mexico, and all who seek our protection, to the sort of treatment likely to be meted out to the citizens of a country whose authorities have by their acts brought upon them the ill will and distrust or hatred of a whole people.

THE RUMORED A. B. C. AGREEMENT.

Now, we hear strange and incredible rumors that the administration has entered into agreement with the governments of other nations under which we are bound to take no step by overt act to avenge the outrages upon, or to protect the lives of our citizens in Mexico, whatever may happen or occur there, until we have received the assent and approval of such nations.

I find it hard to believe that the administration has been disposed, or has dared or presumed, to enter into so humiliating an arrangement or alliance, at least without consulting the coordinate treaty-making branch of our Government, but this rumor has wide currency.

The administration went the limit, and beyond its authority, when it intervened in behalf, and became the ally of, the Carranza government in allowing our territory to be used as the theater of warlike operations by transporting the military forces of Carranza hundreds of miles over our territory. Surely the administration has not so far forgotten the limitation of its independent authority as to believe or assume that it may enter into agreements with foreign nations binding the United States not to maintain its honor, defend the integrity of its soil, uphold its sovereignty, or protect its citizens except on the assent and permission of a foreign nation or nations. The administration has gone far in jeopardy of our rights and honor, but, unless I mistake the temper of the American people, they will not for a moment tolerate such a surrender of our sovereign rights as that.

AS TO ARMED INTERVENTION.

These persistent rumors that the administration has made agreements not to use force in Mexico without consulting other nations have followed the revival of the demand in certain quarters for armed intervention.

There is an old saying relative to the futility of locking the stable door after the horse is stolen. It would be even more futile to propose to apply a match to the barn under such circumstances.

Three years ago there were, I understand, upward of 50,000 Americans residing and doing business in Mexico. They had done much to enhance our prestige and increase our business in that country; they had built homes, invested large sums of American capital, and had property worth hundreds of millions of dollars. I have repeatedly said, and I have from the beginning believed, that under a policy of absolute neutrality and noninterference in Mexican affairs and of stern and definite insistence upon the protection of American lives and property, there never would have been any occurrences which would have justified or seriously suggested armed intervention. To-day the major portion of American property that was destructible or get-at-able is destroyed; only a handful of Americans remain in Mexico, and they are leaving rapidly. If we did not intervene when we could have saved hundreds of lives and vast properties, shall we intervene now? As we did not intervene when intervention would have protected our people, sustained our honor, and preserved our prestige, shall we intervene now when intervention can have little other purpose than that of vengeance and a belated effort to restore the prestige that is lost?

If after bearing so long the humiliation and the ignominy of the administration's policy Congress now desires to take another course across the border, well and good; but Congress should remember that if it does it, it is done at the end of an ignoble record of inactivity, during which it has allowed the policy of the administration to create a condition in Mexico in which, so far as we are concerned, practically all has been lost, including honor.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman, in speaking about the happy opportunity of intervening which was so unfortunately missed, is doubtless referring to the administration of President Taft?

Mr. MONDELL. I did not yield for the gentleman to misquote me or misstate my position——

Mr. BORLAND. I am endeavoring to state it correctly——

Mr. MONDELL. Because I have never believed armed intervention necessary if a proper policy were followed. I have constantly, continually, and on numerous occasions called attention to the fact that the policy the administration was pursuing would lead to armed intervention or to a condition of affairs such as we now have in Mexico. I have frequently warned against the policy of interference and intermeddling, because I believed it would lead to the conditions that now exist.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman a few moments ago said that not having intervened—I do not know he said at the proper time, but at a time when it would have saved American life and property; that is what the gentleman said; that time was, I understood by the gentleman's reference, during the administration of President Taft, and that that was the time we should have intervened to save lives.

Mr. MONDELL. The administration of President Taft had nothing to do with a situation in Mexico such as has arisen during this administration.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MONDELL. I do not yield to the gentleman further, for my time is limited.

Mr. BORLAND. But this raises a very important question here.

Mr. MONDELL. I have gone over that and called attention to the fact there were comparatively few outrages before this administration; that they were not only few compared with those that have occurred since, but those which occurred were of a character that would ordinarily and necessarily arise in a country in insurrection, and none were directed at an American because he was American. They were the sort of crimes that come in a disordered country, and there were comparatively few of them. Nobody thought of intervening then but a few hotheads; but under this administration, as a result of its policy, outrages have multiplied by the hundreds, and in the main have been directed against Americans as Americans, because of the exasperation of first one and then another of these Mexican factions against our policy, not of "watchful waiting"—there has never been a minute of "watchful waiting" since our forces took Vera Cruz—our policy of multiplied interference with the affairs of Mexico, our policy telling the Mexican people they should not be allowed to have the government and ruler they approved, but the government we approved. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BORLAND. Now will the gentleman allow me to recur to the question?

Mr. MONDELL. How much time, Mr. Chairman, have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like the gentleman to confine himself to the question I asked him. Would he have advised intervention when American life and property could have been saved, as he says, during the administration of President Taft?

Mr. MONDELL. I have never advised intervention, but I have continually attempted to awaken the country to the fact that this administration is bringing us by its deliberate acts of interference—of intervention, if you please—was bringing us to a position where ultimately we must intervene if we are to save anything in Mexico, either for ourselves or anybody else. We could have avoided all that if the administration had pursued a proper policy.

The gentleman talks of intervention. The administration has intervened repeatedly. It intervened against Huerta in favor of Villa, Zapata, and Carranza. It intervened in favor of Villa against Carranza, and finally it intervened in favor of Carranza against Villa. These interventions went all the way from private assurances and personal promises from the President's personal representative to sundry bandit chieftains through acts of open partisanship, like the shipment of or embargo on arms, to open acts of intervention, such as the attack on Vera Cruz and the transportation of Mexican troops over our territory. Every act of intervention that could and would prejudice our standing or embarrass or imperil our people was adopted; but this intervention always fell short of any act or attitude that would establish our prestige or protect our people. Our Democratic friends have sought, and quite successfully, to create the impression among our people that the only alternative to the administration's policy was armed intervention and war. That has not been the situation at any time.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. If I can get two minutes more, I will be glad to. Can the gentleman from Illinois yield me two minutes more?

Mr. CANNON. I can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois for one more minute.

Mr. CANNON. I yield the gentleman one minute.

WHAT SHOULD HAVE BEEN DONE.

Mr. MONDELL. Had the administration in the beginning, after waiting a reasonable season to indicate disapproval of the methods employed to bring about and detestation of the crimes which accompanied the change of government in Mexico, recognized the government of Huerta, or, having refrained from so doing, made it clear we would take no hand in Mexican affairs and play no favorites; had we insisted upon the protection of the lives and property of Americans and other foreigners in Mexico; had we firmly and definitely and emphatically given all factions and all leaders to understand that our people, as well as all foreigners, must be protected and respected in their person and property on peril of our proceeding at once against the guilty parties; if this had been our policy, my opinion is there would have been but little destruction of foreign property and little loss of life or serious crimes against our people or other foreigners, and the probability is that long ere this peace would have been restored.

HOPING FOR A RETURN TO TRUE AMERICANISM.

A review of this sad and sorry record is neither pleasant nor inspiring. It is necessary to be done lest we forget the chain of causes that have produced these horrid and gruesome effects. We can not bring back the lives that have been cruelly sacrificed; we can not restore the property destroyed; we can not cure the devastation wrought; and a generation can not restore the confidence or reestablish the prestige we have lost. We can only hope and pray that Providence may in the future deliver us from such as would so foolishly and cruelly serve us in our foreign relations, and restore to us the leadership of those who shall preserve our honor and our standing and protect our citizens in every land and on every sea. [Applause.]

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, at the very outset of what it is hoped may not prove a wholly unprofitable discussion of a momentous and vital question, which has been suddenly and, I believe, unwarrantably thrust upon the American people regarding the national defenses and the need of increasing them at huge expense and practically without limit, it is my desire to call the attention of this House and the attention of the country to the fact that since 1905 the United States has spent upon the Army no less than $1,071,515,401.68 and on the Navy the staggering total of $1,474,686,315.49. The grand total is more than two and a third billions. Yet we are told by the advocates of increased appropriations for Army and Navy that the country to-day is "utterly defenseless" and that it could not "for a day" resist the approaches of a foreign foe.

That the people of the country have been considerably alarmed by the false stories given wide currency in support of the jingo program can not be doubted. They have been plied with misinformation. They have been deliberately and most cruelly deceived by those who design thus to stampede them into compliance with the great plans which call for heavy and ever heavier drafts upon the substance of the toilers. They have been worked upon in the name of patriotism until in many instances they appear ready to do the bidding of that interest which is already reckoning its stock-exchange profits out of the moneys Congress is expected to appropriate for increased armament.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are multiplying evidences that the propaganda of deceit and misinformation was begun too early. The plain folks out in the country have been given time to think and to inquire. They have been afforded an opportunity to examine some of the facts—not all of them, by any means, but enough of them to give them some basis for conclusions. Among the facts which they have come to realize is the salient one that we have already been spending money most lavishly on our Army and Navy—more than two and a third billions in the last 11 years, as before noted. If we are still without defenses, what has been done with the money? If we are still at the mercy of a foreign foe, is there any possible assurance that if expenditures were doubled better results would be secured? If more than two thousand millions of dollars have been devoted to the Army and Navy and yet these are hopelessly inadequate in the hour of possible need, have not those who have supplied the money out of their labor and their self-denial a right to demand that before another penny shall be tossed into this ravening maw some accounting must be made of all that has gone before?

How many people six months ago knew that our Navy is the second most powerful afloat? Our metropolitan newspapers and our magazines and our defense leagues studiously befogged the facts. They were careful to keep from view the testimony of our own naval experts within the year. And what was that testimony? It was given before a committee of this House. It was printed in the hearings of that committee. And it tells us that our Navy ranks next to that of Great Britain and far ahead of the navies of France, Japan, Russia, Italy, and all other countries in the world. It outranks that of Germany, and to-day it may not be much inferior to that of England, for no one at this hour can tell what losses have been sustained by the British fleet. We know that these losses must have been heavy. We know that an inflexible censorship has been maintained by the Admiralty. We know that the German submarines have levied a terrible toll upon British merchantmen. Can it be that only these have paid the price? Can it be doubted that the fighting machines also have paid?

And if the British fleet has suffered, how has it been with the fleet of Germany? Has it gone scot free? Has it sustained no losses? Has it come through the terrible ordeal thus far unscathed? Who will believe that it has? Who will accept the hysterical notion that Germany is to-day stronger upon the sea than she was a year ago, when Admiral Fletcher and other naval experts told a committee of this House that our Naval Establishment was stronger than that of the Kaiser's?

I shall not undertake to deal with this subject, as I know it will be dealt with by the courageous and invincible leader of the majority on this floor. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has left the Navy League of the United States without a leg to stand on in its attempt to rush the people of the United States into a mad rivalry with Europe in military and naval expansion. He has met every argument advanced by the league with irrefutable facts. He has exposed the duplicity of those who have sought to throw dust in the eyes of the American people. He has pilloried those who would commit the United States to the supreme folly of arming for an imaginary conflict, for a conflict which can only come on our own invitation and by our own devices. Too much honor can not be done this brave leader, this honest American legislator, this splendid citizen who has dared to stand up and challenge all the forces of privilege in the Republic and to confront them with the only weapon of which they are afraid—the weapon of truth.

I pay my humble tribute to this gallant leader, to this resourceful friend of the people, to this strong champion of genuine Americanism, to this man of the hour who stands between the toilers of the Republic and those who would saddle fresh burdens upon them. [Applause.] It is to him that the masses are turning in this crucial moment. They are learning to know him, to trust him, and to love him. He towers high above the sordid crew which is clamoring for more millions and more billions to carry Bethlehem Steel, Crucible Steel, Du Pont Powder, and all the rest of the "war brides" to new high levels on Wall Street. And I have the same confidence in him that I have in the cause which he has so splendidly adopted as his own; and as I believe that cause must ultimately triumph over the war traffickers whose propaganda has been sweeping across the continent, so I believe that the American people will stand by CLAUDE KITCHIN and vindicate the intrepid course which he has so wisely chosen.

Mr. Chairman, let no one on this floor deceive himself. The temper of the people of this country is not for war, nor is it for the things which make for war. And who can doubt that warships and standing armies do this very thing? Was it some mollycoddle, some little American, some pro-German, some coward and craven who said that "overgrown military establishments, under any form of government, are inauspicious to liberty and are to be regarded as peculiarly hostile to republican liberty"? No; it was the Father of his Country who so expressed himself long ago. And George Washington was at least as good an American and as brave a man as the tempestuous and explosive hero of San Juan Hill. He was at least as true a patriot as those officials of the Armor Trust and the munitions ring who are now engaged, through various defense organizations, in manufacturing sentiment in favor of a standing army on American soil and of a navy great enough to overawe the world. [Applause.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Did you ever hear of a man of real courage wanting to run a bluff on anybody?

Mr. BAILEY. I never did, sir.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Do you not believe that nations are just made up of individuals, and that a nation that had an iron down its back and had the right kind of courage would not want to overawe the people or want to bluff them?

Mr. BAILEY. Not any more than John L. Sullivan would want to overawe a little boy.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the pretense is made by these evangels of peace at any price—and it is your jingo who alone is entitled to be known as a peace-at-any-price man—that the Army and the Navy are wanted purely for defensive purposes. But is not the pretense altogether too bald? Does it deceive anybody? Can any discerning eye fail to perceive what lies behind? The organ of the Navy League of the United States in an unguarded moment gave the whole case away. It stated with blunt frankness that the Army and Navy are wanted not for defense but for aggression, for commercial adventure, for the conquest of markets, for world supremacy, for empire. And ignorance is responsible for this folly of follies. Were the plutocrats who constitute the guiding forces of the Navy League of the United States and its allies less blind than they are regarding economic truth they would understand that it is not necessary to subdue men in order to gain their trade. It is necessary only to win their confidence, to invite and earn their trust, to meet their wants and supply their needs, and to offer them a fair equivalent for whatever value or advantage they may have to confer. The United States might annex the whole earth in a commercial sense were it to open all its markets to the world as freely as the markets of New York and Chicago are open to all the people of the 48 States. More than half the jealousies and suspicions which separate the peoples of the globe to-day grow out of the superstition that trade is war, and that in order to gain markets we must conquer the country in which the markets are found.

Let me turn for a moment to the consideration of another phase of the general question of military preparedness. We are told that we must have an Army of 2,000,000 men. Well, accepting this at face value for the time being, let us consider whether we can get it. Are the young men of America ready to make up this huge Army? They have not been overready to make up the Army we now have. With the utmost exertion and only with the most flamboyant and deceptive advertisements is it possible to keep the present force recruited. Nearly one-fifth of the men who enlist become deserters, and in becoming deserters have a price set upon their heads. During recent years nearly 50,000 men have deserted from the Regular Army of the United States. These men have become criminals in consequence. They have sacrificed their citizenship. They have fixed upon themselves by their desertion an ineffaceable stigma.

May we reasonably hope for a better state of affairs when we shall multiply our standing Army by 20, raising it from 100,000 men to 2,000,000? Will the causes of desertion be diminished in inverse proportion? Shall we turn out fewer criminals than are now being milled from that mint? Are we to resort to fewer and less gross deceits in enticing the youth of the land to give up gainful employment and the life of home and family and widening interests for the purpose of wearing a uniform and carrying a gun? Or is the alternative to be that which is already being gravely urged—that of enforced military service? If we can not now recruit our Army fast enough to make up for desertions, how can it be possible to keep the ranks of a larger force filled unless we adopt the military systems of the Old World?

It can not be done. And the advocates of a huge standing army recognize the fact when they begin to couple with their demand a suggestion of compulsory military service. They are guilty of no self-deception. They know that if the army of which they dream is to be recruited it must be under compulsion. No country in all the tide of time has maintained a great standing army by other means. The youth of no land the sun ever shone upon were willing freely to give up the best years of their lives to military service, which meant nothing but hardship to themselves and perhaps enslavement for their country. Always and everywhere the ruling class have been compelled to resort to compulsion when they felt it necessary to buttress their power with a standing army. And the ruling class in this country are not blinking at the fact. They are meeting it fairly and are making no concealment of their plan to graft upon America a system which was the destruction of every free government of the past and that is the accepted instrument of every tyrant who now cumbers this old earth.

I want to ask my countrymen whether they are prepared to follow along this dangerous path. I want to ask them whether they are ready to sign the death warrant of free government in this Republic. I want to ask them whether they are themselves to rule or whether they are bent upon turning our institutions over to a class which feels even thus early the spur of necessity pricking it on to courses which the ruling classes of all history have pursued. Let no one tell himself that the proposals now before the country are final. They are only the beginning. Once fairly started on this road, there will be no stopping. Militarism never was satisfied; it never will be satisfied. It is always reaching out for more, always sighing, with an Alexander, for new worlds to conquer, always lamenting, with a Roosevelt, that there is not war enough to go around. If we yield now to those who would commit us to a policy strange to our ideals and incompatible with our liberties, does anyone lay the flattering unction to his soul that these ideals and these liberties will survive a contact so baneful?

There is a subtle poison in this preparedness which is breaking down the fabric of our thought and eating out the very vitals of our national spirit. In what terms are we thinking to-day? Not in terms of peace, not in terms of brotherhood, not in terms of international amity, not in terms of good will and justice, not in terms of charity and forbearance, not in terms of patience and generous allowance. Nay. It is in quite other terms—in terms of force, in terms of suspicion, in terms of jealousy, in terms of rancor and prejudice and ill will, in terms that make for misunderstandings and bitterness, in terms rankling with the acrid venom of hatred and shot through with the deadly distillations of unreasoning passion. This may sound like empty rhetoric. But is it? Read the daily press. Listen to the fulminations from pulpit and platform where jingoism finds voice. Dip into the literature of the hour. Mingle with those who catch their inspiration from the patriots for profit. If you do not in all these find proof of what is here said, then you are capable of making interpretations which are clearly denied to me.

Mr. Chairman, of whom are we afraid? Who is offering us any affront? Who is coveting our territory? Who is threatening our institutions? I do not forget, nor have you forgotten, that the President of the United States himself has declared that we are in danger from no quarter. Yet we are asked to prepare and very adequately prepare. For what? Against whom? On what account? Who has answered or even attempted to answer these very pertinent questions? Who indeed. There is no answer to them. To attempt to answer them is to render absurd all the hysterical talk with which the country has been deluged during recent months. We are to be attacked and overwhelmed by some unnamed power when the European war is brought to an end. That is one of the answers. But every power in Europe will be exhausted when the war is over. All Europe even now is on the verge of exhaustion. Both in men and in resources the nations now at death grips are nearing the point of collapse. Yet we are asked to believe that when this tremendous struggle is brought to a close through exhaustion—and it will scarcely close short of that—one of the nations, or perhaps a combination of them, will turn at once upon us to recoup the losses that war has entailed. Could absurdity go further? Could rational minds be more grossly insulted than they are when talk of this sort is addressed to them in support of a policy otherwise without support? For there is no support for the policy except this irrational and fantastic conjuring with the possible.

Of course it is possible for Germany and Russia to combine against us when this war is over. Equally, of course, it is possible for Britain and Austria to do so. It were even possible for all the nations now at war to forget their hatreds and their jealousies and their mutual scars and to make common cause against the United States. But we are not dealing with possibilities in this world of cause and effect. We are dealing, rather, with probabilities, with reasonable sequences and consequences, with logic rather than with dreams, with facts rather than with unbridled fancies. While it may be granted that there are many possible contingencies growing out of or merely following the great war, where is the human probability that any exhausted nation or any conceivable combination of exhausted nations will thirst for more blood and seek to slake that thirst at an American fountain?

Some of us in this crisis of the Republic find ourselves most unhappily out of touch with leaders we have hitherto followed unfalteringly and with glad steps. It is a grief to us that a difference of opinion has resulted in a momentary divergence of our paths. But here I am reminded of something written by Thomas Jefferson a long time ago. It seems to fit a situation which faces us to-day as it fitted the situation which he had in mind.

During the throes and convulsions of the ancient world—during the agonizing spasms of infuriated man, seeking through blood and slaughter his long-lost liberty, it was not wonderful that the agitation of the billows should reach even this distant shore; that this should be more felt and feared by some and less by others; and should divide opinion as to measures of safety. But every difference of opinion is not a difference of principle. We have called by different names brethren of the same principle. Error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left to combat it.

And it is to reason that we who stand for peace are appealing to-day. We are not questioning the patriotism of most of those who differ with us in this hour of stress. We believe them, or most of them, actuated by motives as high and as unselfish as our own; but we honestly and most sincerely question the wisdom of the method they have chosen in dealing with a great and momentous occasion. The United States has been mightily stirred by the awful conflict raging across the Atlantic. Nearly all of us have kin over there. No home is bereft there without a shadow falling across the threshold of a home in this haven of the oppressed.

The agitation of the billows of the Baltic and the North Sea has reached even this distant and peaceful shore and many emotions in American breasts have been the response—emotions of fear, emotions of sympathy, emotions of hatred, emotions of suspicion, emotions of sheer selfishness and greed. And out of these emotions have come many and varied differences of opinion. Some of us have been concerned with respect to our own safety. These have feared that out of the blood and fury of the mighty conflict in which Europe is weltering may come a fearful danger to our own land and our own institutions. And this fear has been played upon magically by some who nurse ambitions and by others who harbor sordid desires, and by still others who cherish race prejudices or national bigotries—all together conspiring, perhaps unconsciously, to bring about a state of the public mind which tends to find expression in terms of force, in battleships and air craft, in submarines and long-range guns, in shrapnel and men in khaki.

But, happily, reason is left to combat errors of opinion which may have obtained in connection with the great conflagration which has touched us with its searing tongues. We are not bound to accept the word of authority. Each of us is free to exercise his own judgment, to follow his own conscience, to consult his own convictions. Are we in danger? If so, there is no American unready to meet it, none who would pause to count the cost involved in meeting it. We have been told, and repeatedly told, that we are not threatened from without. But are we threatened from within? If so, will continentals and warships avert the danger? May they not indeed enhance it? Revolutions are not stopped by armed men. But a thousand revolutions might have been averted by turning swords into plowshares and soldiers into husbandmen. If we are endangered from within, the situation is to be met, not by building battle fleets and planting our harbors with mines; it is not to be averted by turning the Republic into a military camp; it is not to be disposed of by levying fresh taxes on the toilers of the land; it is to be dealt with successfully only by removing the causes which produce unrest and uprooting the injustices which provoke resentment and incite bitterness of class feeling.

May I not, in conclusion, appeal to reason and to common sense in the consideration of this vital issue? The poison of preparedness has undeniably crept subtly through our whole system of thought and national effort. It has brought a sort of madness upon many minds. It has obsessed thousands with the dread of some awful consequence to ourselves of the European struggle. Yet what I contend, to paraphrase the language of the great Richard Cobden, is that America is to-day so situated in every particular of her domestic and foreign circumstances that by leaving other governments to settle their own business and fight out their own quarrels and by attending to the vast and difficult affairs of her own enormous realm and the condition of her own people she will not only be setting the world an example of noble morality—which no other nation is so happily free to set—but she will be following the very course which the maintenance of her own greatness most imperatively demands. It is precisely because America is so strong in resources, in courage, in institutions, in geographical position, that she can, before all other powers, afford to be moral and to set the example of a mighty Nation walking the paths of justice and of peace. [Applause.]

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BAILEY. If I have the time.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I notice that the gentleman says in his remarks that this Nation should deal with probabilities and not possibilities. Why should not this Nation deal with possibilities?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, it is a pretty big job.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. But we are a pretty big Nation.

Mr. BAILEY. It is quite possible we may have an eruption here almost anywhere, maybe in Washington, like they had in the island of Martinique, but we can not guard against that.

Mr. Chairman, under the leave given me to extend my remarks it is my desire to append a table setting forth the annual appropriations on account of the Army and Navy from 1905 to 1916, inclusive. This table follows:

Expenditures on Army and Navy, 1905–1916.

	Army.	Navy.
1905	$77,070,300.88	$97,505,140.94
1906	70,396,631.64	100,336,679.94
1907	71,817,165.08	102,071,670.27
1908	78,634,582.75	98,958,507.50
1909	95,382,247.61	122,662,485.47
1910	101,195,883.34	136,935,199.05
1911	95,440,567.55	131,410,568.30
1912	93,374,755.97	126,405,509.24
1913	90,938,712.98	123,151,538.76
1914	94,266,145.51	140,718,434.53
1915	101,019,212.50	144,868,716.61
Total	969,556,205.11	1,325,024,450.61
1916	101,959,195.87	149,661,864.88
Total	1,071,515,401.68	1,474,686,315.49

It is also my desire to incorporate with my remarks a few extracts from a statement issued by Majority Leader KITCHIN to the press of North Carolina, respecting the strength of the Navy of the United States in comparison with the naval strength of other countries. In this statement the majority leader said:

MR. KITCHIN'S STATEMENT.

The five-year program increases our naval appropriation over forty times more than the increase by Germany in five years preceding the European war, and $200,000,000 more than the combined increase of all the nations in the world for the five years preceding the European war, and over $50,000,000 more than the combined increase of all the nations in the world for the whole period of 10 years immediately preceding the European war.

Add to this the fact that prior to the beginning of the European war we were expending annually on our Navy from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 more than Germany or any other nation (except Great Britain) was expending on its Navy.

For the 10 years preceding the European war we had expended on our Navy over $300,000,000 more than Germany or any other nation (except Great Britain) had expended on its Navy. And yet the metropolitan press, the magazine writers, the "patriotic societies," and the jingoes and war traffickers would frighten the country into the belief that we have a little, puny, eggshell of a Navy.

The five-year naval program calls for an increase of $500,000,000—$100,000,000 increase a year—which, including the inevitable incidental expenses for expanding the whole Naval Establishment in order to accommodate the program, will reach $600,000,000 or over by the time the five years expires. This is all extra—in addition to the large appropriations we have been annually making.

The Army four-year program demands $450,000,000 increase, over $100,000,000 a year extra, being an increase of more than 100 per cent over our annual Army appropriations. All extra appropriation, be it remembered. Extra taxes must be paid by the people, be it remembered.

Before leaving the subject of the enormity of the proposed program, I desire to make a further observation:

At the expiration of the five-year period for the program this country will then be expending on its Navy and Army more than any nation in the world in times of peace ever expended on its army and navy; more than England, with her navalism; more than Russia or Germany, with their huge militarism. At the beginning of the European war Germany was expending for past wars and preparations for wars (on its Army and Navy) 55 per cent of the total amount of revenues collected; Japan, 45 per cent; Great Britain, 37 per cent; France, 35 per cent; the United States, over 60 per cent. With the proposed military and naval program enacted into law the United States will be expending over 70 per cent of its total revenues; that is, out of every $100 collected from the people over $70 will go into militarism and navalism, including pensions, leaving less than $30 for all other functions of our Government and for all other benefits of the people.

Equally interesting are some facts relating to the personnel of the Navy League of the United States and kindred organizations, which are so largely responsible for the remarkable agitation in support of increased appropriations by Congress for the Army and Navy. Under this head I take the liberty of quoting from a recent speech on this floor by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER]. That gentleman has made an exhaustive study of the activities of the organizations in question, and in the following has embodied some facts which the people ought to know. He said:

CONNECTING LINKS BETWEEN THE NAVY LEAGUE AND THE HOUSE OF J. P. MORGAN & CO., 23 WALL STREET, NEW YORK.

The Navy League upon close examination would appear to be little more than a branch office of the house of J. P. Morgan & Co. and a general sales promotion bureau for the various armor and munition makers and the steel, nickel, copper, and zinc interests. At least, they are all represented among the directors, officers, founders, or life members of or contributors to the Navy League.

Especially are all forms of big business represented, and big business invariably heads in at 23 Wall Street, New York.

J. P. Morgan was formerly treasurer of the Navy League and is now a director and contributor. He is a director also of the United States Steel Corporation and many other corporations.

Herbert L. Satterlee, former Assistant Secretary of the Navy Department and a brother-in-law of J. P. Morgan, was one of the incorporators and founders of the Navy League and is the present general counsel of the league.

The late J. P. Morgan was one of the founders and principal contributors to the Navy League, and as late as June 10, 1915, $2,000 was subscribed on behalf of the Morgan estate.

Edward T. Stotesbury, a member of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. and a director of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, and until recently a director of Cambria Steel Co., Phoenix Iron Co., Riverside Metal Co., Temple Iron Co., Wm. Cramp & Sons Ship & Engine Building Co., and 54 other corporations, banks, and trust companies, is one of the honorary vice presidents of the Navy League. The Wall Street Journal on July 26, 1915, reported that the Baldwin Locomotive Works had received a war order for $80,000,000 worth of shells and other munitions.

Robert Bacon, former Secretary of State and partner of J. P. Morgan & Co. and first director of the United States Steel Corporation, is a director of the Navy League.

Henry C. Frick, a fellow director of J. P. Morgan on both the United States Steel Corporation and the National City Bank of New York, is an honorary vice president of the Navy League.

Jacob H. Schiff, a director with J. P. Morgan on the National City Bank of New York, contributed $1,000 to the Navy League June 10, 1915.

J. Ogden Armour, a director with J. P. Morgan on the National City Bank of New York, was one of a committee which, under the auspices of the National Security League, issued a statement certifying as to the patriotism of the Navy League.

Cleveland H. Dodge, a director with J. P. Morgan on the National City Bank of New York and a director of the American Brass Co., Commercial Mining Co., Copper Queen Consolidated Mining Co., Detroit Copper Mining Co., of Arizona, Lackawanna Iron & Coal Co., Montezuma Copper Co., and the United Globe Mines, is a life member of the Navy League. Marcellus H. Dodge, a nephew of Cleveland H. Dodge, is a director on the boards of the Remington Arms-Union Metallic Cartridge Co., and the Remington Arms & Ammunition Co. Cleveland H. Dodge is vice president of Phelps, Dodge & Co. (Ltd.), a $45,000,000 corporation, which is one of the leading factors in the copper industry in the United States. Although the millions of Cleveland H. Dodge have been multiplied through the increased value of his copper holdings as a result of the European war, his firms appear unwilling to share their prosperity with the miners in Arizona. Some 5,000 copper miners are now on strike, and because Gov. Hunt, of Arizona, has dared to protect them against an invasion of lawless thugs and strike-breakers, the mine owners are circulating petitions for his recall. The leading corporation involved in the Clifton-Morenci strike is Phelps, Dodge & Co., of which Cleveland H. Dodge is vice president. The company in 1912 earned 23 per cent on its capital of $45,000,000 and paid a 15 per cent dividend. To-day copper is higher than at any time in nine years, yet the company refuses to grant its men a wage increase or to make any concession. The principal property of the company at Clifton paid in 1912 a dividend of 146⅔ per cent on a capital of $1,000,000.

Joseph P. Grace, a director with J. P. Morgan on the National City Bank of New York, is one of the contributors to the funds of the Navy League.

George F. Baker, jr., a director of the First National Bank of New York and a son of a director of the United States Steel Corporation, contributed $1,000 to the Navy League June 10, 1915.

Allan A. Ryan, a director of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, is a contributor to the Navy League, and George R. Sheldon, another director of the Bethlehem Corporation and also a director of the American Locomotive Co., both of which concerns have profited hugely from European war orders, is an honorary vice president of the Navy League. Considering that Charles M. Schwab, the president of Bethlehem, is one of the founders of the Navy League, it would appear that this war-trafficking firm has full representation in this organization. And it always has been well represented. Robert H. Sayre, a former general manager of Bethlehem, was a life member of the Navy League, and Lieut. J. F. Meigs, who left the Navy Department to go into the employ of Bethlehem, was also a life member.

Beekman Winthrop, a former Assistant Secretary of the Navy and now a director of the Lackawanna Steel Co., is a director of the Navy League.

Former United States Senator W. A. Clark, the "copper king of Montana," is a director of the Navy League and a director of the W. A. Clark Titanite Explosive Co., Colusa-Parrot Mining & Smelting Co., Equator Mining & Smelting Co., Henry-Bonnard Bronze Co., Mayflower Consolidated Mining Co., Moulton Mining Co., Ophir Hill Consolidated Mining Co., Original Consolidated Mining Co., Sunset Mining Co., United Verde Copper Co., and 26 other corporations.

Charles F. Brooker, honorary vice president of the Navy League, is president and director of the American Brass Co. and a director of the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co., Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., Mechanics & Metals National Bank of the city of New York, and 15 other banks, trust companies, and corporations. On April 10, 1915, Mr. Brooker also owned 474 shares of Bethlehem Steel, which was worth $40 a share previous to the outbreak of the European war, and went as high as $600 on October 22, 1915.

Lewis L. Clarke, treasurer of the Navy League, is a director of the American Locomotive Co. The Standard Corporation Service on May 3, 1915, reported that the American Locomotive Co. had concluded negotiations with the British Government for the manufacture of 5,000,000 shrapnel shells to cost $66,250,000.

A. Barton Hepburn, honorary vice president of the Navy League, is a director of the American Car & Foundry Co., which has received large munitions contracts from the allies.

Henry B. Joy, vice president of the Navy League, who opposes Government manufacture of war munitions, is president of the Packard Motor Car Co., which has received large orders from the allies.

T. Coleman du Pont, president of the Du Pont de Nemours Powder Co., was formerly a vice president of the Navy League. The Du Ponts have managed to maintain a monopoly of the sale of smokeless powder to the United States Government, and have received some $25,000,000 worth of contracts in the last 10 years.

I do not desire to make the charge that President Thompson and Secretary Dadmun, of the Navy League, are deliberately falsifying in insisting that this purely patriotic organization is backed by "men who will not profit by the league's propaganda," because it is possible that they have reiterated this view so often that they have come to actually believe it themselves. I doubt, however, whether they can convice the American people that they have not been imposed upon.

It has seemed to me worth while, Mr. Chairman, to bring the question of the cost of this program as close home as possible. No one seems to know exactly what this cost is to be. Estimates vary widely. But that it will be very large and will not diminish as the years go by is certain. My own estimate is that the program of military and naval expansion which has been proposed will cost not less than $500,000,000 a year. Some have set a five-year limit upon it, apparently assuming that at the end of five years we may rest from our labors in the matter of defending our shores against some imaginary foe. But of course the work of "preparation" will go right on, just as it has gone on in the past, as the figures I have given above clearly show. However, I am assuming that sanity will repossess the Nation at the end of the five-year period and that the program will therefore call for a total expenditure of only two thousand five hundred millions. On this calculation I have apportioned this cost upon the people of my district on the basis of population as shown by the census of 1910. In that year the population of that district was 313,868. It includes three counties—Bedford, Blair, and Cambria. The population of Bedford was 38,879; of Blair, 108,858; of Cambria, 166,131. This burden of $2,500,000,000 means $25 per capita. And it must be remembered that every dollar of it must come out of the toil and self-denial of the workers. Not one penny of it will come from the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. Not a groat will be a fairy gift. The last mill will be produced by toil and will be collected by the taxgatherer. If this program shall be carried out it will cost Bedford County $972,025; Blair County, $2,721,450; Cambria County, $4,153,875. But that I may bring the thing still nearer home, I show in the appended table the distributive share of the burden by the minor civil divisions, based on the census figures of 1910. The table follows:

REFERRED TO THE VOTERS BY CONGRESS.

Do you favor the general plan of increasing the Nation's Military and Naval Establishments, as proposed in the December 7, 1915, address of the President to Congress, namely: An increase in the Regular Standing Army from 108,008 (all services) to 141,843, and the creation of a volunteer enlisted citizen army of 400,000 men required to undergo discipline and drill not over two months a year for a three-year period; also, for the Navy, a five-year program of construction to provide 10 battleships, 6 battle cruisers, 10 scout cruisers, 50 destroyers, 15 fleet submarines, 85 coast submarines, 4 gunboats, 1 hospital ship, 2 ammunition ships, 2 fuel-oil ships, and 1 repair ship; and to enlist enough more men and educate more officers to man these ships, the total increase of said national armament estimated to cost, in five years, $500,000,000?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WILSON of Florida having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. J. Res. 47. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to sell skins taken from fur seals killed on the Pribilof Islands for food purposes;

S. J. Res. 80. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point René W. Plató y Wentworth, a citizen of Cuba; and

S. J. Res. 81. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis Mr. Carlos Hevia y Reyes Gavilán, a citizen of Cuba.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on January 18, 1916, bill of the following title:

S. 1230. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Fox River at Aurora, Ill.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] use his time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

MEMORIAL ADDRESS ON THE DEATH OF GEN. GRENVILLE M. DODGE.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as the years go by the shadows of death are fast closing over the heroes of the Civil War. One by one its great leaders have passed away, and recently the grim messenger summoned Grenville M. Dodge, the last general who commanded a Union Army in that contest. As he was at one time a member of this body and most distinguished both in war and in peace, I have thought it not improper to ask the House to lay aside for a short period the business in which it has been engaged in order that a tribute might be paid to his memory.

Mr. Chairman, great men arise from great occasions. The tremendous struggle between the North and South which convulsed this continent created and brought forth great souls. Out of this time of storm and stress rose in the North Lincoln, Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, and other mighty men, among whom was Gen. Dodge, whose ability, forcefulness, and genius was such that no history of that great conflict would be complete without their names entering into it.

Mr. Chairman, it was a distinguishing feature of that war that the great men whose names were inseparably connected with its history were not upon either side influenced by the motive of military fame. They found no pleasure in battle and sought neither reward nor glory. The surpassing valor which was shown on both sides and the priceless sacrifices which they made came from devotion to principle and not through any love of slaughter. Thus it followed that the great armies which were formed were not dangerous to the liberties of our people, and when the war closed many of those who had so much distinguished themselves in battle became preeminent in the upbuilding of the Nation through the arts of peace. Among those who had acquired fame as commanders and whose genius manifested itself notably in developing our national resources, none holds a higher place than Gen. Dodge. Here he is second to none.

Born April 12, 1831, at Danvers, Mass., and dying full of years and honors January 3, 1916, few men have seen so much of life and had so remarkable a career. Like most of our great men he came from the common people, but he graduated at a military university in a neighboring State, after which he took a course in engineering. At the outbreak of the war he immediately enlisted, was appointed a lieutenant, and served until its close. By sheer force of merit, without any support or influence, he rose rapidly through the grades to a major generalship. He was a friend of Lincoln, an adviser of Grant, the reliance of Sherman, the builder of the first Pacific railway, the partner of merchant princes, the associate of Roosevelt. All did him honor and he was an honor to them. In his military services from the beginning he attracted the attention of his superiors by his marked capacity as an organizer and the vigor and energy with which he pushed to completion every task which was assigned to him. If a railway was to be reconstructed, if supplies were to be found, if additional troops were to be furnished, at a time when mistakes or delays were fatal, Gen. Dodge was selected to direct the work.

Two great events stand forth in his life and no reference to his achievements would be complete without mentioning them. One of these events was connected with the decisive battle of the Civil War, the other was one in which his leadership in both war and peace was conclusively demonstrated.

Mr. Chairman, in such a varied and strenuous career inevitably there came times when the bravest might have faltered and the strongest yielded to the strain; but his was a mind that quickened with responsibilities, and his genius ever rose with the greatness of the obstacles. Never was he greater than on that fateful day of the Battle of Atlanta, when with a suddenness that was stupefying there burst forth the thunder of artillery that shook the heavens itself, and out from a wood there rushed upon the rear and flank of the Army of the Tennessee a furious charge of the opposing forces with all the valor of men who are determined to conquer or die. The brunt of this terrific attack fell upon the Sixteenth Corps, of which Gen. Dodge was in command. In this appalling crisis, when his superior, Gen. McPherson, was killed and all looked to him for orders, when his ranks reeled and staggered under the apparently irresistible onset, when every moment some new and desperate emergency arose, the master mind of Gen. Dodge met the swiftly changing situation as calmly and effectively as if holding a counsel of war in his tent. The tide of battle was turned and the Union Army saved from a defeat so calamitous that words could not describe it.

Later in civil life when it was sought to build a transcontinental line through what was then known as the Great American Desert, the difficulties seemed unsurmountable. In this wild country bands of hostile Indians roamed, which suddenly appeared out of some canyon or gulch, surprised and slaughtered the whites before they had an opportunity to resist, and then disappeared as if the earth had opened and swallowed them up. The engineers who began the work were driven away or killed. Laborers who had been brought together fled in terror. Teamsters could not be found to bring supplies, and the undertaking was suspended. It needed not only engineering skill but organizing and defensive ability of the highest degree to carry on its construction. Gen. Dodge was selected for the position of chief engineer and took personal charge of the operations. He hunted down and compelled the submission of the Indians, overcame the obstacles in the way of transportation, laid out the route, and supervised the construction of the road. It was a monumental achievement, which placed his name among the great builders of the Nation.

He served in this body in the Fortieth Congress, but commercial enterprises rather than a political life were to his taste and he declined a reelection. His admiring comrades of the Army, which he had commanded, elected him as president of the Society of the Army of Tennessee, a position which, although bringing neither power nor emolument, he seemed to value more highly than any he had ever held. He was also president of the New York Commandery of the Loyal Legion and president of the commission to inquire into the management of the War with Spain.

Personally, Gen. Dodge was modest and unassuming. In his great exploits he saw nothing of which to boast or to proclaim. Public spirited and philanthropic in the highest degree, no worthy object failed of his support, but it was never his desire that his benefactions should be made public. His interest in his home town of Council Bluffs never lessened. The great city of New York called him for many large enterprises and sought to lure him away, but he could not be induced to change his residence. The citizens of Council Bluffs will never forget his devotion to its interest, and that one of his last requests was that it should be his burial place. There where every citizen does him honor and every child is familiar with his achievements, among the hills that gave the city its name, not far from the spot where Lincoln and he had stood and selected the eastern terminus of the great railway he had constructed—there he was reverently laid to rest by the side of his old friends and comrades who had gone before.

Mr. Chairman, although the State of Iowa claims Grenville M. Dodge as her own and Council Bluffs was his home, such a man belongs not to any town or any State alone, but to the Nation. Monuments will be erected to his memory, but no marble or bronze will commemorate his achievements like the great railway whose bands of steel link the boundaries of our domain. The time may come when this Government shall dissolve, its warriors and statesmen be forgotten, and the mighty works of its builders crumble into dust, but as long as the history of the period in which he lived is preserved the record of his achievements will exist, his place among the great men of this Nation will be fixed, and his fame forever secure. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I was indeed interested in the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. He undertook to discuss this appropriation bill, and he let it come out very readily that he was not opposed to appropriations, but wanted it all to go into the pockets of the Steel Trust and the bunch over there from under whose smokestacks he comes, and wanted to wipe out all of the appropriations generally and to hold back for piling them all in for a big army and to be fitted up by his Steel Trust constituents. And next he amused me by saying that he was afraid of somebody coming over here and landing an army. I asked myself, "Who is likely to come here and land an army?" The only crowd that ever did was England, and we got out of our swaddling clothes and whipped her, and then we whipped her again before we cut our wisdom teeth, and I do not think she would come now. She does not have to. She has got Morgan serving as a resident envoy and minister plenipotentiary and has a judge advocate general in two Members from Massachusetts here on the floor. We are serving her as a base of supply now very nicely. She does not have to come. And Germany could not get here. And France has never wanted to come. She is too little to make much of a showing if she were to get here.

But over all this talk about German-Americans and Irish-Americans and the poison of the foreigner in this country I want to tell you when you will never hear any more of it. You let some foreign country land in this country with an invading army and there will not be a German-American here. There will be American Germans. There will not be any Irish-Americans, but American Irish; all the millions of loyal foreigners and the whole American citizenship will fall into a melting pot and come out militant Americans and they will march down like Abraham's army, 10,000,000 strong, and inside of a month one-half of that invading army will be in eternity and the balance of it will be begging God to save them from the wrath of outraged America. [Applause.]

I am not uneasy about their landing their troops. It is a pipe dream of those who feel the throb of war profits.

I have a few minutes left, and I want to say that the question of what I shall wear has become a national problem. [Laughter.] I have no antipathy or animosity toward the press gang. They can sharpen both ends of their pencils and punch me if they want to, but the New York World has seen occasion to put me up as a kind of a buffer while they very gratuitously seek to lambaste and belittle the farmers of Texas. And I want to say to the New York World that in Texas we have tarantulas, horned frogs, wolves, a whole lot of centipedes, and things like that. But all of them have never done us half as much harm as the New York World and the money changers of New York, and I am not going to let them lambaste farmers over my shoulder. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I just ask leave to extend my remarks in that connection in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, leave will be granted. There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Hit them hard now. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Thank you, my friend.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in the freedom of the press. Having owned newspapers for 17 years in Texas, during which time I had the honor of being president of the Texas Press Association, it is but natural that I should look upon the press as one of the great schools of progress and information. Yet when papers like the New York World undertake to use me and the clothes I wear to malign and slur the farmers of Texas by saying that these farmers had made me promise to never wear a collar in the event of my election to Congress, I say, with all kindness for the assiduous, erudite, and versatile young reporter, the World is carrying the esthetic taste of the eastern plutocrat a little too far.

Texas as a whole, leaving out myself, of course, will compare favorably in honor, honesty, morality, and ability with any

State in this Union, either in national politics or otherwise, and her farmers rank with the best people on earth.

It is true that many of them are poor, but when we consider them with the common man elsewhere, for 40 years under the domination of the money devil and money changers of New York, who have been the pets and partners of the New York World, it is much to their credit that they as farmers have been able to live at all.

Twenty years ago my elder brother, being subject to bronchial trouble, ruptured a bronchial tube while making a speech as district attorney and died of resulting hemorrhages. Physicians, in consequence, advised me to take good care of my throat and lungs, which I have endeavored to do by wearing in winter seasons what was then known as Waves mufflers.

This week I pulled off a silk muffler that cost $1.50 and put on a 15-cent collar, and it became a national sensation. But for the benefit of the very delicate, fastidious sensibilities of the New York "gentry" and diamond-decked dudes who read the World I beg to say that I have little regard for the flummery, frills, flounces, and furbelows that the world calls fashion.

I think comfort, decency, and health should be the governing factors in the selection of all dress.

'Tis not the leaves upon a tree
That make the timber fine;
'Tis not the vestry preachers wear
That makes their lives sublime.

'Tis not the raiment people don
That makes a glorious state;
'Tis not the jewels in a crown
That make a kingdom great.

Right is right, for God is God,
And truth will make us whole;
The hope of man must ever be
The goodness of his soul.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] use the balance of his time?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think this bill ought to pass. The gentleman from New York has no speech to make except his own and proposes to close the debate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; that is all.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I, and how much time has the gentleman from New York?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has 14 minutes and the gentleman from New York 20 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Frankly, if I made any remarks in general debate, I would sooner follow the gentleman from New York than precede him. Really 14 minutes is not time enough for any Member of the House to discuss extensively any of the public questions now being considered throughout the length and breadth of the United States. At a proper time, if I can get the time and the spirit moves me and I feel that I really have something to say, I will seek the opportunity.

This is a bill called the urgent deficiency bill, proposing to give in round numbers $12,000,000. In the main I agree to what is recommended by the committee and did agree when the bill was being made.

There are one or two items that I should have been glad to see in the bill but which were not included. There is one that I hope will go into the bill, but I can say in regard to it all I desire to say under the five-minute rule.

Now, if there is no gentleman who wants to submit some remarks during the remainder of my time upon this bill, I will yield the floor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it had not been my purpose to make any remarks upon this bill, but it seems perhaps appropriate, after what has occurred, that I should make a very brief statement in reference to it.

This is a bill to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and for prior years. It carries $12,500,000. The estimates submitted were for sums aggregating $13,565,000.

Three gentleman representing the minority, who are members of the Committee on Appropriations, have occupied the major portion of the time allotted to debate. They are not only members of the Committee on Appropriations, but they are three men of the longest service in the House of Representatives, and can fairly be said to rank among the most distinguished Members of the House. None of them has pointed out a single item in this bill that is subject to criticism. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] devoted almost an hour to a criticism of the Democratic Party for extravagance in the expenditure of public money, and he took up a discussion that was begun some time last month by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] as to the relative defenselessness of both parties with respect to the charge of extravagance. But he did not find it necessary to call attention to a single item in this bill, carrying $12,500,000, as an evidence or indication of extravagance on the part of the Democratic Party in its present control of the House.

I take this attitude of these distinguished gentlemen as an additional compliment to the very effective and efficient committee over which I have the honor to preside. It demonstrates that whatever may be said in the heat of political discussion about the conduct of the finances of the Federal Government, there has not been during the five years in which the Democrats have been in power in this House any just ground for criticism of the Committee on Appropriations for extravagance or improper action regarding appropriations for the support of the Federal service.

While this bill carries $12,500,000, very little of that money can be considered in the nature of deficiencies in appropriations to supply the needs of the various services. For instance, $250,000 is appropriated to pay a treaty obligation with the Republic of Panama. Under a treaty with that nation $250,000 is to be paid annually in perpetuity as part of the purchase price of the rights of the United States in the Canal Zone strip. That is one of the outstanding obligations of the Republican administration to which I referred when I answered the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], for which provision has been made in this bill and has been made during the five years in which the Democrats have been in control of the House.

Three million five hundred thousand dollars is for work in connection with construction of public buildings authorized at various times by Congress. Without any increase of force, the Supervising Architect's Office has been so much more efficient under a Democratic administration than it was under a Republican administration that it has so speeded that office up that this year it is turning out 99 buildings instead of 65 buildings as originally estimated. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And because of the speeding up of the program heretofore authorized by Congress, it becomes necessary to make provision for carrying on and completing the work on many buildings at an earlier date than originally was anticipated.

Two million four hundred and forty-eight thousand dollars is for the Postal Service. The Post Office appropriation bill failed of enactment at the last session of Congress. A continuing resolution, which made available sums similar to the sums appropriated for the Postal Service for the fiscal year 1915, was enacted in its place. As a result the department has had less money available for the various services than was agreed upon by the conferees representing the two Houses in charge of the Post Office appropriation bill. So far as my recollection goes, in no instance does the amount carried for the Post Office Department make, with the amount provided by the continuing resolution and what is carried in this bill, a greater sum than the amount agreed upon by the conferees on the Post Office bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What are the particular items of deficiency in the Post Office Department that are provided for in this bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are a number of them.

Mr. MANN. They are mostly for transportation.

Mr. MADDEN. I was going to say——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Railway transportation is a very large item; electric and cable service, purchase of twine and binding twine.

Mr. MADDEN. The department reports very large unexpended balances in a great many branches of the Postal Service, and I was wondering whether they had the right to come before the Committee on Appropriations for urgent deficiency appropriations under those circumstances.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They do not report any very large unexpended balances in these items, except the item for railway-mail pay, and that is not an urgent deficiency; but the appropriations that are available are somewhat more than a million dollars less than will be needed to make payments, and, as the estimates were transmitted at this time, the item was included in this bill rather than carried over into the general deficiency bill, so that the payments might be made promptly.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Under the circumstances I take it that there will be further deficiencies in the Post Office Department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was not inquired into outside of the items before the committee, and on some of these items it is quite possible that there will be further deficiencies.

Mr. MANN. I should assume that extending the appropriations of the prior year would not be sufficient to take care of the Post Office Department for the current year, with the addition of these items. I should think it would be much more than these items before the year is over.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These are the items as to which the department stated that there was necessity for immediate appropriations, and the investigation seemed to disclose that that was correct.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the First Assistant Postmaster General's division of the Post Office Department reported something like $5,000,000 of an unexpended balance in the salary account of the clerks, carriers, postmasters, and supervisory officers, notwithstanding the fact that he was operating under the appropriation of the year before; and, of course, that was largely due to the fact that he had reduced the compensation of a great many men from the figure provided by law to an arbitrary amount which he fixed upon his own authority.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Still, there are no items in the bill, as I recall, that come under the First Assistant Postmaster General.

In the Department of Agriculture there is $357,000, of which $57,000 is to reimburse appropriations which have been drawn upon because of the necessity of employing labor to fight forest fires. Three hundred thousand dollars is an emergency appropriation to combat the citrus-fruit canker, which is very prevalent in the citrus fruit growing States. One hundred and sixty thousand dollars is for the Bureau of Standards, to complete the chemical laboratory within the limitation fixed by law and to equip the building which will be completed very shortly. Two hundred thousand dollars is to make repairs to aids to navigation which were very seriously injured as the result of several cyclones on the Gulf during the present fiscal year, and $67,000 is to replace life-saving stations which were completely destroyed or very seriously injured as a result of the same storms.

Then there is an item of $210,000 to pay judgments of the Court of Claims, $59,000 to pay Indian-depredation judgments, and $924,000 to pay audited claims certified by the accounting officers under the law.

These items aggregate in all $10,305,000, so that the sums carried here which actually represent deficiencies are very small.

Mr. Chairman, I do not often indulge in political discussions as to expenditures by the Federal Government, or as to the manner in which its revenues are obtained; but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] made one statement to which attention should be called. He said he did not criticize the Democratic Party for spending the money so much as he did for not obtaining the revenues to meet the expenditures, and that the Republican Party has always enacted legislation to provide adequate revenues to meet any expenditures it has made.

The gentleman overlooked one very important fact, and that is that during a period of three or four years the Republican Party supplemented the moneys received from its revenue-producing legislation, to the extent of $134,000,000, from the proceeds of bonds issued under the legislation affecting the Panama Canal. There have been expended on account of the canal sums aggregating $240,000,000, for which bonds under the law can be issued in order to reimburse the Treasury, and if the Democratic administration followed the policy initiated and adopted by the Republican administration, of reimbursing the Treasury on account of expenditures for the construction of the Panama Canal, and issued Panama Canal bonds so as to put into the Treasury $240,000,000, there would be little heard from the Republican side of the House as to the actual balance of available cash in the Treasury at any time.

Mr. GILLETT and Mr. LONGWORTH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield first to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that while the Republicans were in control they averaged more payments for the Panama Canal out of the general fund of the Treasury than the Democrats have paid out of the general fund for the same purpose?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not my recollection.

Mr. GILLETT. My recollection is that they did.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They did not issue any more bonds in order to reimburse the Treasury on account of the expenditures that were made, because they were not permitted to continue in power. There is not any doubt that if the Republicans had remained in control of the Federal Government the bonded indebtedness of the country would have been very greatly increased, probably by $200,000,000, and some future Democratic Congress would be doing what this Democratic Congress is doing, raising and paying about $4,000,000 annually as interest upon the bonds issued by the Republican administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman let me finish?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. During the last two years you paid out of the Treasury about $20,000,000 a year for the Panama Canal, did you not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not got the figures in my mind. I do not know.

Mr. GILLETT. That is a fact. I think one year it was $19,000,000 and the other $21,000,000; and I will venture to say that in the previous years, after we began the canal, when the Republican Party was in power, we averaged much more than $20,000,000 a year out of the Treasury, to say nothing of the bonds.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When the Republicans saw that they were to continue in power they replenished the Treasury by the issuance of the Panama Canal bonds, to reimburse the Treasury for the expenditures on account of the canal. When they saw the handwriting on the wall, when they knew that they were about to get the judgment of the American people for their years of misdeeds, they expended these enormous sums out of the general fund in the Treasury, and instead of reimbursing the Treasury and leaving the money available for the Democratic administration they refused to issue the bonds, and now they cry out that we have created the deficit. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So that if more money was expended during the years the Republicans were in power than when we were in power, it only emphasizes the statement that the present condition is due to the gross mismanagement of the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I desire to ask the gentleman a question touching the revenue, and I ask merely for information without any political motives. Can the gentleman state what action the party of which he is one of the ablest and most competent leaders is about to take with reference to following the recommendation of the present Secretary of the Treasury for retaining the duty on sugar?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Ohio is mistaken. I am not one of the responsible leaders of the party. [Laughter on the Republican side.] More than that, if the gentleman will content himself with patience he will find what the program of the Democratic Party is to be. Whatever it is, there will be no such conditions as resulted during the administration of a distinguished Republican President—a native of Ohio—during my service in the House. No Democratic President will ever send a message to Congress that it is their plain duty in the interest of justice and humanity to enact certain legislation for the relief of the people brought under our flag, and have our party, because of the greed and avarice of the manufacturers, refuse to carry out the recommendations of the President.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I desire to thank the gentleman for his categorical reply. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman wish to ask me a question or tell me something? [Laughter.] I will yield for a question, but I will not have any remarks of mine filled up by gratuitous inaccurate statements of Members on the Republican side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. With all due courtesy to the gentleman, I want to ask him a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Very well.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman made a statement that I want him to correct.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I will not permit the gentleman to correct what is already perfect.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to state the question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman from New York desire more time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; if I can have time not only for the gentleman from Michigan to ask his question but time to answer it.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from New York made the statement in reference to the expenditures out of the general fund for the construction of the Panama Canal. During the Republican administration up to the 3d of November, when the Democratic Party enacted the tariff law, there have been expended out of the general fund, and in addition to the sale of bonds, $191,000,000 on the Panama Canal. In addition to the $191,000,000 there were spent $138,000,000, which included premiums and the proceeds of the sales of the bonds, and yet, under the Democratic administration you have not sold any bonds, but you have spent $77,000,000 since that time. We left you $149,000,000 in the Treasury and you only have about $40,000,000 left.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I heard the gentleman from Michigan make that same statement in his remarks on continuing the war-revenue act. There is only one unfortunate thing about it, it is so tainted with error that it is not correct. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman state wherein I have erred?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not the time now. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Oh, it is easy for gentlemen to laugh; but I will make one statement to show that the gentleman is in error. I will not state views, opinions, or notions; I will state official figures. The gentleman said that we have expended $77,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. Since the 3d of October, 1913, up to the 10th of January, 1916.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's figures do not jibe. He must have been reading Republican statements and imagined that they were Democratic statements. There were $134,000,000 of bonds issued and $240,000,000 of bonds available. The expenditures for the canal up to the present time are $378,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. The Treasury statement shows $390,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know the statement I make is accurate, because I have looked up the figures to put them in a report on a bill.

Mr. MADDEN. That does not include what has been expended for fortifications.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose the figures of the gentleman from Michigan include that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does not, because they are always carried entirely apart. There are $240,000,000 of bonds that can be issued to reimburse the Treasury on account of the expenditures of the Panama Canal. The $240,000,000 were obtained to replace and reimburse the Treasury. It would give $149,000,000 that he is worried about——

Mr. FORDNEY. It is not me that is worrying.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This side of the House has not been weeping and wailing at the condition of the Treasury as have gentlemen on that side of the House. They seem to imagine that they are still in control of the Government, and they have restless nights and uneasy dreams, and then they come in here and give voice to them on the floor of the House. It may help them to sleep easier, but it does not alarm the country or disturb this side of the House at all. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. I see there are 49 or 50 items in the post-office division which are marked for commencing post offices. Have they been ordered before or are they ordered by this bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. These are buildings which they have reached for construction upon which no work has been yet begun. After sites are acquired and buildings authorized, the buildings are listed and taken up in their order. A number of buildings will be taken up which it was not anticipated would be reached. This bill carries the money that it is believed will be necessary on account of the work on these buildings between now and the 30th of June.

Mr. EMERSON. Then they were ordered by a previous Congress?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, CONSTRUCTION, SITES, AND RENT.

For sites, commencement, continuation, or completion of public buildings within the respective limits of cost authorized by law, severally, as follows:

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 11, page 4, insert the following:

"Provided, That the appropriations for construction of public buildings made herein shall not be expended for commencing work on any building unless a contract therefor shall have been entered into prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], remarked that no member on the minority side had said a word in criticism of this bill, and he assumed from that that consequently we were all in favor of every item of the bill. That did not follow at all, and the gentleman, if he had reflected, would have known that there are some items in the bill to which I objected. But I am ready to admit that the Committee on Appropriations, in my opinion, does do more for economy than any other body of men in the House. I admit that I am not unprejudiced and perhaps my partiality for my own committee may lead me to think that, but the figures which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] placed in the RECORD in his speech about a year ago, I think, fully substantiate the fact that somehow by precedent, which has come down through many years, there is an instinct of economy in the Committee on Appropriations, no matter which party controls, which, I am sorry to say, does not prevail throughout the House in general.

Here is an economy, Mr. Chairman, which the present Committee on Appropriations might have initiated. My amendment practically provides that no new building for which a contract has not already been let shall be begun in the coming year. That would save this year about $2,000,000, and the buildings which it would cover amount in the whole to some $7,000,000.

I do not wish now to suggest or go into the question whether appropriations for these public buildings were extravagant or not when the public building bill was passed. My only argument to-day is that in the present diminishing condition of the Treasury, in the deplorable lack of revenue, compared with the enormous emergency expenses which the administration has recommended, it is a time when the majority party ought to suggest that we do without some luxuries and get along on the plain necessities of life. It seems to me that new public buildings, desirable as they are to all of us individually, and possibly—although I do not wish to go into that—justifiable on public grounds, ought not to be entered into at this time of deficiency and stress, and it is for that reason that I offer this amendment, so as to give an opportunity which the gentlemen on that side seem to think the minority never does, and to point out to them a chance for that economy on which they so plume themselves.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is very clear to the Members of the House. If adopted, no money that is carried in this bill on account of the construction of buildings will be expended contracts for the construction of which have not been made prior to the approval of the bill. These estimates were transmitted to the Congress and referred under its rules to the Committee on Appropriations. For the fiscal policy of the Government I am not responsible. Whatever views I might have as to the desirability or advisability of recommending expenditures for any particular purpose at any particular session of Congress, I have no control or part in the submission of the estimates. I do know, however, Mr. Chairman, that during my entire service in this House, regardless of the control of the House by either political party, there has been an overwhelming majority in favor of appropriating such sums for the construction of public buildings as are requested and stated by the Treasury Department can be utilized with the time covered by the appropriations to be carried in the particular bill. Not only has there been an overwhelming majority in favor of such appropriations, but I have been strongly of the suspicion that there has been a very substantial majority in favor of appropriations in excess of those requested and those recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

In charge of this bill, under the uniform and unbroken practice of the House for half a century, I am charged with the obligation of explaining exactly what effect particular amendments may have, and with protecting the bills as spokesman of the committee. The members of this committee now understand the purpose of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], and it remains with this committee to determine whether the policy suggested by him shall be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Burlington, Wis., post office: For continuation, $500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Where an appropriation of $500 for "continuation" is made, is it because we made a previous appropriation of $500, which was not sufficient for plans?

Mr. FITZGERALD. On what page is that?

Mr. MANN. Oh, there are a number of them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is for the work in connection with the preparation of the survey of the site, to enable the plans to be prepared. I think that is so in most instances.

Mr. MANN. This is for "continuation." We frequently make an appropriation of $500 or $1,000 for surveys, and for the preparation of plans, but where we make an appropriation for the continuance of a work for $500——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The word "continuation" would be used if the original authorization was for a site and building, but if the site were provided independently, the wording would be a little different.

The Clerk read as follows:

Yoakum, Tex., post office: For commencement, $15,000.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out line 8, on page 16. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he can tell us why it takes the Treasury Department three years to select a public-building site when there is really no dispute about it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a matter of administration, and I can not speak for the Treasury Department on matters of administration.

Mr. DILLON. Can the gentleman give any information on the subject, of why it should take so long to select a site in the absence of any dispute about the subject?

Mr. FITZGERALD. All might be in agreement on a site that would be a good one for everybody but the Government to have. For instance, I have heard it said that a site was sold to the United States in a western town which was completely covered by water. It might be everybody in that place was in perfect accord that it should be sold if anybody could be found foolish enough to buy it, and the United States Government probably was the only possible purchaser that could be induced, under any circumstances, to buy such a site.

Mr. DILLON. I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I am not in a position, let me say to the gentleman, to answer questions regarding the various departments of the Government which involve purely a question of administration. I am not administering them, and I am consulted very little about how they should be administered. I am not in a position to explain or advise regarding their motives and purposes.

Mr. DILLON. I would like to ask the gentleman one other question, and that is if the gentleman does not think the real purpose of the delay is not to withdraw funds from the Treasury that have already been appropriated?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I do not think much about any of those things that do not come to me; but, judging from what happened since this Congress has met, and the fact that this bill is carrying about $3,000,000 of buildings that it was not believed would require money until after the beginning of the next fiscal year, and that provision was made in here for 22 buildings that it was not believed would be commenced within the next fiscal year, or before the 30th of June, 1917, it would not appear that the Treasury Department has been attempting to delay the work of public buildings for the purpose of preventing the withdrawal of money from the Treasury of the United States on that account.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in this connection that I think there are many of these appropriations made for public-building sites in the selection of which as much time as three years has passed and the Treasury Department failed to make any selection. Somebody ought to be able to explain why it takes so long to select a site.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why does not the gentleman ask the officials of the Treasury Department?

Mr. DILLON. I have, and I am told the reason why is that they do not wish to withdraw the money from the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and, without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Vaults and safes: For vaults and lock-box equipments and repairs thereto in all completed and occupied public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $10,000.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I notice this bill, on page 10, item 20, contains an appropriation for a public building at Logan, Ohio. I am delighted with the amount set out here, and I take it for granted that additional appropriations will be made as occasion demands. The building is in process of construction and has been for some time, and the people of that city are very desirous of having this building completed at the earliest possible date under the contract.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will tell his constituents that they should appreciate the efficiency of this office under a Democratic administration and show their appreciation at the next election.

Mr. MANN. They will show their appreciation of the gentleman who gets it in the bill—the gentleman who just previously addressed the House. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Improvements and repairs: The unexpended balances of the several appropriations for the construction of the bridge across Rock Creek on the line of Q Street, including the approaches thereto, contained in the District of Columbia appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1912, 1913, and 1914 are made available until June 30, 1916.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Why is it necessary in the matter of appropriations to make these old appropriations for the Q Street Bridge available until the end of this fiscal year? In other words, why are they not available now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it is due to a decision either of the auditor or the comptroller that because a contract was made at a time between the making of the appropriations they could not pay the contractor, this man West. They are to make some additional contracts, and the question has arisen again. They made one contract which contained a provision that payment should not be due until the appropriation is made by Congress.

Mr. MANN. I am very willing to make the appropriations available. I think the buffalo they have up there are the finest things I have ever seen in statuary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I have seen them just as bad in the past and expect to see them a great deal worse in the future.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman usually sees and hears lions roaring over in New York, where they keep a herd of them, or tigers, where they are felt over in New York [laughter on the Republican side]; but these are American bison.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay: For pay of the Army, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1915, $1,200,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, in line 25, strike out the sum "$1,200,000" and in lieu thereof insert the sum of "$1,199,772.62."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think this is real Democratic economy—you have cut down 25 cents.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. What, not that much?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know whether it is due to the gentleman's inability to either add or subtract, but there is a difference of something like twenty-eight dollars and something.

Mr. MANN. I said 25 cents; I was only off a few dollars.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is to correct an error in the total of the deficit in the pay of the Army.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the chairman of the committee what is the cause of this large deficit in the pay of the Army?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, there were a number of causes. They had more officers and men than they expected to have during the fiscal year and they did not have enough money with which to pay them.

Mr. TILSON. Were there more men enlisted than they anticipated when the estimates were made?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Some more; yes.

Mr. TILSON. An increase in the Army caused by enlisting more men?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To some extent; and also it is stated by Gen. Aleshire that the appropriation was not sufficient for the number of men for which the estimate was submitted.

Mr. TILSON. Was the entire estimate last year appropriated for?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Three hundred and fifty-five additional men in the Hospital Corps; and the deficit in the pay of officers was due to the increase of officers because of the act of July 18, 1914, increasing the number of officers in the Signal Corps by 60. They had 16 more officers on an average than were anticipated when the estimates were submitted. Then there were $26,586.72 due to an increase in the number of men drawing pay in the Philippine Islands and Alaska. They get the foreign-service pay, which is 10 per cent, I think, in addition to the regular pay. Then in the Corps of Engineers, pay of officers, there was $1,420; payment made to enlisted men on discharge for clothing not drawn, $528,663; interest on soldiers' deposits, $25,675; three months' additional pay for reenlistment, $132,035.

Now, those are things that can not be estimated for with any degree of accuracy, and the sums mentioned were needed in addition to the amounts requested and appropriated by Congress.

Mr. MANN. I can give the gentleman the information he asks for, if he has not already secured it.

Mr. TILSON. I have not received any information on the items, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. The amounts appropriated for the fiscal year were $429,575.58 less than the estimates on these items.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] does not understand what the gentleman from Connecticut desires. I was giving him the information furnished—the actual figures making up the deficit, furnished by the Quartermaster General.

Mr. MANN. But the appropriations were less than the estimate. I saw that the gentleman did not get the information, and I gave it.

Mr. TILSON. My attention was attracted to the item because of its magnitude.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not large at all. During the last year of the Taft administration my recollection is that the deficit in the appropriations for maintenance of the Army aggregated $2,900,000, and the statement of the representatives of the War Department before the committee were to the effect that they were directed to request less money than they knew would be actually required. That situation has not happened under a Democratic administration.

Mr. MANN. Every year it is just the same thing.

Mr. KAHN and Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] for any information that he has on the subject.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am informed on that subject, for I asked the questions and got the answers from men who were serving under the Republican administration.

Mr. TILSON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. KAHN. So far as the deficiency appropriation in the last year of the Taft administration is concerned, to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has referred, I want to call his attention to the fact that in that Congress the Democrats had control of the House. They cut the estimates suggested by the War Department to such an extent that subsequently it became necessary to appropriate the amount named by the gentleman from New York to make good the deficiency. That is the way that large amount came into this House. It was because of the failure of the Committee on Military Affairs, under Democratic control in the House of Representatives, to appropriate enough money to pay the Army, and likewise to cut the appropriations for other purposes of the Army.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, Mr. Chairman, so that there will be no misunderstanding of what happened, I will state that the last year of the Taft administration, when the House was Democratic, the deficit was $2,900,000. It was stated some time a little later in the session that the men who prepared the estimates of the amount of money required for the various purposes of the Army were directed, and against their protest were compelled, to make estimates which they informed the President were insufficient to meet the obligations.

Now, in the last year of a Republican House the deficits for this purpose that were submitted and supplied by Congress aggregated $1,800,000. The gentleman's statement about a Democratic House coming way below the estimates and not supplying enough money to carry on the service is just one of those idle, vain pieces of buncombe, which, I regret to say, so many of the gentleman on that side of the House have been indulging in since this session of Congress convened.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is quite correct in what he says about the estimates having been cut in the War Department at the request of the President; but I still maintain that those estimates were still further cut, cut below a safe figure, by the Democratic majority of the Committee on Military Affairs when they reported out the bill. And the Democratic majority in the House approved that cut over the protest of the minority, who predicted there would be a deficiency if the cut were made.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Did not the committee deliberately cut the estimates furnished last year by $425,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My committee?

Mr. TILSON. The Military Committee of last year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know what happened within the Committee on Military Affairs; and if I did, I would not be permitted under the rules of the House to state it.

Mr. TILSON. I mean in the bill they brought in.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can say for the committee over which I preside that the practice is to recommend the sums that it is believed are actually required for the proper conduct of the various services of the Government, regardless of what the totals may be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment now pending, offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let the gentleman speak on the amendment pending.

Mr. MANN. Yes. I will move to strike out the last two words of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt whatever, and we might as well be frank about it, that the Democratic side in the Sixty-second Congress, going into the presidential election, cut estimates quite freely where they knew the money would be expended, in order to make a very good showing about what they had appropriated, knowing that they would have to make deficiency appropriations thereafter. I have no doubt in a way that in connection with the so-called Smith amendment the same thing was more or less in the mind of President Taft. All committees may do that at times. The truth is, however, that amidst all the talk about extravagance and economy the fact stands out preeminently all the time that the administrative officers of the Government under every administration are grossly extravagant in their demands.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Add "practices" and I will agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not know what the addition means.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I say, "Add practices" and I will agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Well, demands and practices. I am willing to make the addition. [Laughter.]

We hear a great deal of talk about what they call a national budget system, if anybody knows what that means. I do not know, and I have never been able to get a statement from anybody that claimed that he knew, a statement that was intelligible on the subject. But if there be any need of a national budget system, we have it now established, if the administrative officers would endeavor to practice economy. Every year Congress cuts down the estimates submitted to it by the administration under every administration, and the only place where economy is practiced under the Government is in the House of Representatives. It is not practiced in the administrative offices, and it is not practiced at the other end of the Capitol.

I think that amidst the criminations and recriminations between the two sides of the House as to which has been the most extravagant we might properly put some of the fault upon those who have been at fault instead of assuming that it all belongs to one side or the other of this House. The House, while it becomes very extravagant at times, while many Members of it are always willing to vote for every expenditure and against every proposition to raise revenue, still in the main wants to be fairly economical, and every committee of the House in charge of appropriations finds that its principal business is to resist the demands of the administrative officers and those outside of the Government service for larger appropriations. It is not here where the extravagance is started. The extravagance starts outside and finds its way here from the outside, and we try to resist the demands as well as we can.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Bureau of Construction and Repair: For construction and repair of vessels, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $48,950.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, there are included in this item two items under the Naval Establishment which provide for additional money in the Navy Department for draftsmen and an amount of money for making plans for battleships in the proposed naval program which is now being considered in the Committee on Naval Affairs, and it is not, of course, a deficiency. I do not believe that we ought to anticipate in the appropriation of money what Congress may or may not authorize hereafter.

It is true that in the hearings you will find that a portion of this money is to be used, as is contended by the Navy Department, in making plans for two ships now under construction; but there is about $14,000 or $15,000 in the two items—I have not the exact amount here before me—under the Naval Establishment which ought not to go into this bill.

It is utterly impossible for the subcommittee to absolutely segregate the items so as to determine just how much the Navy Department intends to use or needs on the two battleships now under construction, and for that reason I want the items eliminated, so that the Navy Department will ask for the additional draftsmen which they need for the work now under construction, so that Congress will not be placed in the attitude of making appropriations, having drafts made, and plans made for ships that may never be authorized.

Now, I am not going to take the time of the committee to read the hearings, but if you will take the hearings and read Admiral Griffin's testimony you will find that it is stated at that time that the need of these additional draftsmen was due largely to the fact that they were anticipating a program which was being considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs of this Congress; and for that reason, Mr. Chairman, I move that this item be stricken from the bill. I reserved that right in the committee to make the motion. In the event that that is not done, then I want to reduce the item by the amount, as nearly as possible, that will be used for that purpose on new naval construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 21, by striking out the paragraph beginning with line 2 and ending with line 5.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the testimony before the committee does not show that any of the sum carried in this item is to be utilized in the preparation or performance of work in anticipation of any ships to be authorized hereafter. Congress at the last session authorized two battleships, No. 43 and No. 44. Proposals were invited for the construction of those ships. The bids submitted by the private contractors were so much in excess of the limit of cost fixed that the Secretary of the Navy, under the authority conferred upon him by the naval appropriation bill, directed that the vessels should be constructed in two of the Government yards.

Admiral Taylor, the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, in speaking of this item, made the following statement:

Part of the money was to be used for draftsmen in the two yards; the balance of it here in the bureau in Washington.

He was asked whether the amount to be used was on account of anticipated legislation. He stated that the building of these ships in the two yards necessitated the preparation of all the plans from the beginning. He says the material has already been contracted for, and that deliveries will commence within six months from December 1, 1915. In order to have the material delivered, certain plans must be prepared in advance, so that the material can be turned out and sent to the yards on schedule.

In the testimony of Admiral Griffin, the Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, it appeared that for 15 or 20 years the practice of the Navy Department has been to do certain preliminary work in connection with the plans for ships that have been suggested or proposed in advance of the legislation authorizing the ships.

This work must necessarily be done in advance or else after the ships are authorized a very considerable delay will take place in the preparation of plans, the obtaining of bids, and the construction of the ships. The number of ships does not materially affect the work to be done, but work is done in the preparation of preliminary plans upon ships of general types, in order that the work may be utilized after it has been prepared. This practice has prevailed in the Navy Department for a great many years.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand this is only for temporary employees in the Navy Department, is it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is only for the balance of the current fiscal year. Additional draftsmen, however, will be required in the two navy yards during the construction of the ships that are assigned there. For instance, the Mare Island yard has had assigned to it a battleship for construction. There are between 2,000 and 2,500 detailed working plans. These plans are prepared as the work on the ship goes on. The mechanics can not do their work until these plans are ready, and it requires a very large additional number of draftsmen to be employed during the period the ship is under construction, so that the plans can be carried on coincidentally with the progress of the work. Admiral Taylor stated that there was a delay of about six months in the launching of the Arizona, which was constructed in a Government yard, because of the lack of the necessary draftsmen to keep the plans prepared up to the progress of the work on the ship.

These men are per diem employees. Their services seem to be necessary. These ships are authorized and are to be built. It is an economy to build them as rapidly as possible, because we have a very considerable amount of money invested in them lying idle, and the overhead charges are a very considerable item. So far as the testimony goes, of these two items aggregating $86,000 there may be used in Washington in the Bureau of Steam Engineering on some preliminary work in connection with ships not yet authorized the sum of $4,250. It does not permit the employment of a very large number of draftsmen, and regardless of our views as to the number of ships that should be added to the Navy, if any ships are to be authorized at this session of Congress, then additional draftsmen are necessary to do the preliminary work as has been the custom since the Government has been engaged in building modern war vessels.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. If this Congress should order only two ships built, will these draftsmen be needed, and will the department need this appropriation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Therefore it does not follow that it is in anticipation of a 4, 6, 8, or 10 ship program?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the estimates which the Secretary of the Navy transmitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury provide in regard to this item:

Pay of additional draftsmen and other technical assistants needed to expedite the preparation of designs, contract plans, and specifications of the vessels which have been recommended to be included in the naval appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1917.

Then, there is an item about vessels 43 and 44. Then, in addition, for the purchase of equipment and supplies and the rental of quarters for the additional force referred to in the item which I first read.

If it be true—and I have no doubt that the statement made by the gentleman from New York is correct, since he makes it—that it has been the custom of the Navy Department to prepare plans and specifications for vessels before they have been authorized, I think it is a custom that ought to be abandoned. It is news to me. The department for many years has recommended more vessels than were finally authorized. I think there is no year in which a number of vessels—not always battleships, but other vessels—have been recommended which have not been authorized. And if it be true that the department has gone ahead, out of appropriations not intended for that purpose, and has provided the plans and specifications for these vessels which were never authorized, it has been an extravagant waste of money, whoever did it. Now, as far as I am concerned, I am going to vote this year for—well, I think I will wait until I make my speech on that subject before I state how many vessels I am for. But I can see no reason why we should go ahead and give to the Navy Department specifically an appropriation to prepare plans for vessels which have not been authorized, and which may not be authorized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman understands the situation. The General Board is engaged continually in the study of the development of war craft.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The estimates submitted to Congress requesting the authorization of battleships of certain types are supplemented with information as to the size of the ships, the size of the guns, and their general characteristics. In order to reach those conclusions, to make the necessary studies preliminary to these recommendations, a very considerable amount of drafting work is necessary in connection therewith.

Mr. MANN. They have reached these conclusions in regard to the vessels which we have just authorized. They have not only finished reaching the conclusions, but they are putting the conclusions into effect. Now, if they want a sum of money to make investigations, they have that all the time. A part of this appropriation is for plans, and so forth, for ships 43 and 44, the contracts for which have just been let, or are about to be let to the navy yards. They are up to date on that. If they are not, those battleships ought not to be built.

Mr. FITZGERALD. None of the working plans are prepared yet at all.

Mr. MANN. Very well, that gives away the case. I am in favor of giving them the money to do that; but if, when they have just made a contract for the most modern battleship that is to be built, they are going to learn something new to-morrow, they had better wait until they let that contract. I do not know whether they have let the contracts, but they have received the bids.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have decided to let the contracts.

Mr. MANN. They have decided to let the contracts, one in California and one in New York, on battleships that are supposed to be up to date if anything is. They are supposed to represent the best wisdom of the world in battleships now. They are preparing the plans and specifications for those ships. What do they need money for—to prepare plans and specifications for some other vessels to submit to Congress this month or next month?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I saw a statement that it was likely to press on the Committee on Naval Affairs the advisability of authorizing battleships of 36,000 tons rather than 32,000, with a main battery to consist of 16-inch guns instead of 13 and 14 inch guns, as at present.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to say that they are going to prepare plans and specifications for battleships in advance of their authorization?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They do certain work and they have been doing it. It is not something that is new or peculiar to this situation. It is considered current work that has been done for 15 or 20 years.

Mr. MANN. But this item does not cover that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. I read the estimate as it was transmitted, and it occurred to me that it was a very unusual proceeding to ask for money to prepare plans and specifications for ships in advance of their authorization by Congress. Admiral Griffin spoke of the sum required for steam engineering, and said $4,250 was desired to be used for the purpose. Admiral Taylor, speaking for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, did not say it was for such a purpose, but did say, In the conduct of the working of the Bureau of Construction and Repair for the past 15 or 20 years certain preliminary work on the plans had always been done before Congress had authorized any ships whatever.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt there is certain preliminary work always done before they make the recommendation, but for that they have a regular appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It all comes out of this appropriation.

Mr. MANN. They have $9,000,000, and they have always paid it out of that appropriation, and they can pay it now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, the $9,000,000 is in the general item, and there is a limit put on that as to how much can be used for draftsmen. It amounts to hundreds of thousands of dollars, but it is limited both in the naval and the legislative bill.

Mr. MANN. That is true, of course.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there can be any question but that the item was asked for, and it was in the mind of the two admirals that came before this committee that that was the chief reason for asking for it. Take the $10,000 item for the purchase of certain tables for draftsmen which they have been needing for a long time and needed to perfect working plans for the two battleships 43 and 44, one to be built in California and one in New York. They said they needed the tables for that purpose, and certain other furniture in the office. While being examined on that question all of these items were in the minds of the committee. Now, on page 114 of the hearings you will find Admiral Griffin's statement, as follows:

Admiral GRIFFIN. We want to get the money as soon as we can, so as to proceed with this program.
The CHAIRMAN. Which program?
Admiral GRIFFIN. The one the Secretary has outlined.
The CHAIRMAN. The one the Secretary has recommended?
Admiral GRIFFIN. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. But that has not been authorized?
Admiral GRIFFIN. No, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You want to go ahead with it before it is authorized—is that it?
Admiral GRIFFIN. Well, we have got to do a lot of preliminary work on these ships. The program carries eight or nine different types of ships; and if we waited until the bill passed, it might be 18 months before we would be able to advertise the ships.
The CHAIRMAN. Suppose there are no ships carried in the bill?
Admiral GRIFFIN. Then, of course, the time would be wasted.
The CHAIRMAN. You are asking us to anticipate that Congress is going to authorize certain vessels?
Admiral GRIFFIN. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You want $2,500 for that?
Admiral GRIFFIN. That is for the Bureau of Steam Engineering.
The CHAIRMAN. What is that for?
Admiral GRIFFIN. That is for equipping the drafting rooms with drawing tables, filing cabinets, drawing instruments, calculating machines, and other office equipment, which we estimate to cost $2,500.
The CHAIRMAN. How long would it take to equip those rooms?
Admiral GRIFFIN. Oh, two weeks, perhaps.
The CHAIRMAN. You would not need this money until the money for the new program becomes available?
Admiral GRIFFIN. Oh, yes.
The CHAIRMAN. Why?
Admiral GRIFFIN. Well, if we waited until the new program is available we would lose just that much time in preparation.
The CHAIRMAN. But you can not start on these ships until they are authorized by Congress?
Admiral GRIFFIN. A great deal of it has to be done ahead—a great deal of it.
The CHAIRMAN. Before they are authorized?
Admiral GRIFFIN. Yes, sir; we have to do a great deal ahead of time.
The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose?
Admiral GRIFFIN. So that we will not delay the advertising of the ships.

Not only that item, but the items I am asking the committee to strike out, are to be used, or nearly all, in anticipation of what Congress may do.

Let the committee also keep in mind that all these employees in the city of Washington are provided for in the legislative bill that comes from this committee, but the draftsmen who work in the navy yards are paid by the Naval Committee. The last Naval Committee that considered the naval program made provision, or is presumed to have made provision, for what is needed to carry out the work that we authorized in that bill; so I think it is indefensible for money to be expended in any department of the Government in anticipation of what Congress may or may not do. The preliminary work they speak of is work that has to do with the type of vessel. That work is done in the city of Washington.

No detail plans and specifications are prepared, no working plans are prepared, but they simply agree on the type of vessel. For until an examination reaches that point it was nowhere intimated in this record that they needed to use it on these vessels that are being constructed in the mind of the Secretary of the Navy as proposed to Congress. Therefore I feel that the item ought to be stricken out. Nor do I feel that there will be any such delay as is contended for, because it is not conceivable to my understanding, if the naval bill shall go through in a few months, how it could delay the building of the vessels in the new program. It might delay it from now until the bill authorizing the vessels is passed, but why should you anticipate what Congress may do? It seems to be a total disregard of the right of Congress to control these appropriations. It was suggested in committee that they might take all the draftsmen and use them on the preliminary work and then come and ask us to give them an appropriation for draftsmen to do the work that they now have in hand. I do not presume that any department of the Government would do that, because if that is done Congress will find itself in doubt where the money has been spent for something not authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it is the duty of the President to make to Congress such recommendations as he deems proper. To do that intelligently, especially touching the construction of battleships and cruisers of different types for the Navy, he should have some knowledge either himself or in the proper department. What kind of a fix would he be in if he recommended various ships and vessels without proper knowledge of what was required? You would call on the Executive or the Navy Department for information—what do you know about it? I do not know anything about it. How much will it cost? I do not know. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, and that is what I gather from the evidence, that for 20 years past this practice has obtained of making plans for vessels not authorized, so as to be able to give information to the Executive, whose duty under the law it is to communicate to Congress such recommendations as he sees proper to make. I became satisfied, and I am now, that this appropriation ought to be made, and I agreed to it, and I hope that the amendment will fail. Of course, if ships are authorized, then when the contract is let, and it can be let without the working plans being made, according to our information, the working plans must be made and made promptly. There are certain ships—if I recollect correctly, two of these great battleships—that are authorized. Those working plans ought to be made promptly, and there ought not to be delay of months for the lack of sufficient draftsmen to make the working plans, as in the case stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. It is true that the last Congress last March did order the construction of two large ships of war, of 32,000 tons each. This action was in last March. It was anticipated then that within a few months the keels of these ships would be laid, and if there was any protection to be afforded by the construction of these ships, that the American Nation might have that protection speedily given it. But the keels have not yet been laid. Information has been given the Committee on Naval Affairs that they will not be laid for some time to come, six months at least, perhaps nine months and maybe a year. A ship is on one of the ways and has to be taken off before another can be put on. The California is on the ways in the New York Navy Yard; a second ship has been assigned to the navy yard at Mare Island. Ways must be provided in that yard before this ship can be constructed. The gentleman from Illinois is entirely correct. When estimates are submitted to the committee, the Secretary of the Navy and the Chief of Construction and Repair both indicate to the committee the design and character of the ship that it is desirable to have added to the Navy. Preliminary plans are made, and from those plans—I have seen them at times—we endeavor to reach a conclusion as to the character of ship. But the real working plans are not made until after Congress acts. Complaint is frequently made here and elsewhere of the delay in making the plans for ships after they are ordered by Congress.

This delay is supposed, Mr. Chairman, to delay the construction of the ship. I believe, from what I know, that the preparation of these plans has at times greatly delayed the construction of the ships, and, if these are the plans for the two ships we provided for a year ago, I would earnestly ask this committee to agree to this provision of the bill and make this appropriation of money. It seems plain to me they are. Do not let it be understood that I am advocating, directly or indirectly, a great program for the Navy. I reserve to myself the right to conclude in the end and after much consideration what I shall do in that respect. But if this money asked here is to hasten the construction of these two great men-of-war authorized a year ago, let us have these plans made, and let everybody employed for the purpose help to work them out. To relieve the apprehension of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], although he is a member of the Appropriations Committee and would know more of the subject than I do, I believe that it was intended by Admiral Taylor to ask for enough money to employ draftsmen to work on these two ships already authorized. I read from his statement, to be found on page 119 of the hearings:

Admiral TAYLOR. Of that $48,950, $19,700 is for expenditure for services in the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the 29 additional draftsmen; the remaining amount is for expenditure for draftsmen necessary at the New York and Mare Island Navy Yards in connection with the construction of battleships No. 43 and No. 44.

The CHAIRMAN. How much is that?

Admiral TAYLOR. $29,250, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The $29,250 is not on account of anticipated legislation, is it?

Admiral TAYLOR. No, sir. The last bill authorized the Secretary of the Navy to construct these ships in the navy yards, and in order to prepare the plans and push the work it is necessary to have an increase in the drafting force.

Admiral Taylor then proceeds in his statement before the committee to say that the shipbuilding in the New York yard requires the attention of draughtsmen already employed, and that the other ship to be built there to immediately follow the California, which is now on those ways, would require the employment of additional draftsmen. Furthermore, additional draftsmen will be needed in the navy yard in California, where No. 44 is to be built. I think No. 44 goes there. It seems to me it is not in anticipation of a much enlarged program for the Naval Establishment that this amount of money is asked, and let me suggest to gentlemen here, having had some knowledge of naval affairs as a Member of this House, this is not a drop in the bucket compared to what will be required if the program recommended by the President of the United States shall be adopted by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I now move to amend this section by striking out the figures "$48,950" and inserting the figures "$29,240," reducing the appropriation $19,700.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Cerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 5, strike out the figures "$48,950" and insert "$29,250."

Mr. SISSON. Now, gentlemen of the committee, this gives to the Navy Department every cent that Admiral Taylor said was necessary to do the work on the two battleships now on the ways, and the $19,700 is the money which would be used on the proposed new program not authorized by law.

Now, I was willing in the committee, and am willing now, to give to the Navy Department every penny that they want for this work, which it is authorized by this Congress to do and to expend, but I am utterly unwilling that they shall expend one cent on a program which may or may not be authorized. That matter ought to be handled by the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is in no sense of the word a deficiency, and we give to them all that they need under the present program.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. The President of the United States, as the gentleman knows, has recommended that four great ships of war be provided.

Mr. SISSON. Yes. I have a great deal of respect for the President of the United States, but I am not willing to represent a people and then permit him to assume the duties and functions of Congress on any matter. I think Congress ought to always retain its control over appropriations and the expenditure of money.

Mr. BUTLER. But I am not asking the gentleman to remove that control; I will assist him, so far as I am able, in maintaining it, but this program is recommended, and without committing ourselves to it, does not the gentleman think it is but fair that the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Navy should have an opportunity to prepare the preliminary plans for these big ships? There may be two of them; maybe there will be but two recommended by the committee and maybe there will be but two agreed to by this House; but is it not fair to the department that it should have sufficient money to prepare these preliminary plans?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman need not be uneasy about preliminary plans. That Navy Department will give all the preliminary plans the Committee on Naval Affairs want. They will not have to have this $19,700 to prepare those plans. Let not the gentleman give himself any uneasiness about that matter. They will get all the preliminary plans that are necessary to have. What I am inveighing against now is that the department, without any warrant or authority, so far as the law now exists, and if you segregate the items and put this $19,700 in a separate item it will be subject to the point of order, because it is not authorized by law. But they put it in one item which has been authorized by your committee, to wit, to build the two battleships now under construction. It is a bad practice, to say the least of it, for the Navy Department, or any other department, to endeavor to take advantage of Congress and put upon them the necessity of withholding what the department may need in order that they might get what the department does not need because of the uncertainty in the item as to exactly how it is all going to be spent.

Here we have the testimony of Admiral Taylor, which the gentleman just read to the committee, in which he states specifically that this amount of money is needed on the two battleships now under construction, or soon to be under construction; and then it follows that this $19,700 is to be used on the proposed naval program which the Secretary of the Navy has offered to this House. I therefore ask the committee to adopt the amendment and give them all they need for the battleships and for the program now authorized by law, but not give them a penny for that which may or may not be authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] will not prevail. If this amendment be adopted, the money necessary to employ draftsmen in the two yards in which battleships No. 43 and No. 44 have been assigned for construction will be provided, but no money will be available to add additional draftsmen in the bureau at Washington. There is no doubt in my mind, and the Bureaus of Steam Engineering and Construction and Repair very frankly stated, that the purpose of obtaining this money is to employ draftsmen for the purpose of expediting the construction of whatever ships may be authorized at this session of Congress. If this money be not voted at this time and these men employed, it will delay for 18 months the invitation for proposals for the construction of these ships that may be authorized. Regardless of what number of vessels may be authorized, whether the largest number suggested by the most extreme big-navy man or the smallest number suggested by the most radical against any great increase in our naval force, I am convinced that whatever vessels are authorized should be constructed as speedily as possible, and this appropriation is to enable that to be done.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In just a moment I hope. If any reason whatever exists for additions to our Navy, large additions or small additions, the necessity that exists for those additions requires the construction of those ships rapidly and the putting of them into condition to be used, and there will be a delay, and a long delay, in the construction of the vessels unless this force for employment in the department at Washington should be authorized. Now, it would have been easy for the Navy Department to have concealed this fact. This estimate could have been prepared and advocated in a manner that would not have disclosed that; and it was for the purpose of obtaining draftsmen to expedite the preparation of plans for ships to be authorized or contemplated at this session of Congress. The estimate is submitted in a form to compel the money to be used for that purpose, so that there will be no misunderstanding of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER]?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. Did the gentleman learn in these hearings that it was proposed by the Navy Department to change the style of the ship and therefore, I presume, more elaborate plans would have to be made?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Admiral Taylor made the statement. I asked him. I said that the estimates have been submitted to Congress, and therefore these draftsmen could not be needed to prepare plans in order to enable the department to prepare the estimates. The statement is that the estimates are of a very tentative character and they wish to reduce them to more definite and substantial form in order to more intelligently discuss what the department desires to do. It is not possible for any men, no matter how competent they may be as naval architects, to give an estimate or to form any opinion that is of any value whatever as to a ship and its characteristics without some comprehensive preliminary plans which can be studied to determine displacement, the speed possibilities, and the ability of the ship to carry guns, ammunition, coal, fuel, and other things that mean weight.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Just a moment more. These men ought to be in a position, whatever Congress does regarding the proposed naval program, to carry out the will of Congress in as expeditious a manner as possible, and build whatever ships that may be authorized as quickly as may be.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I am at a loss to understand just how, if the naval bill passes in the next four or five months, it would delay the construction of these ships 18 months. That is a remarkable statement to make, because it simply means that the draftsmen will be authorized there as soon as the ship is authorized by the naval bill, when it passes the House and passes the Senate, and whatever the delay may be between now and then, the time of its passage will be the only possible delay. Now, if it is so urgent as that, they should put this item in an urgent deficiency bill. Why not put the proposed battleships in the bill and authorize them now? I see no such urgent need, such untimely and undue haste, to get hold of this money.

Now, it is true, as I have understood, that they have demanded more draftsmen in the past than the Naval Committee would give them, but I do not believe it is the function of this committee or any other committee of the House, especially a deficiency committee, to overrule the decision of the Naval Committee, which is presumed to know what it is doing and, I presume, know more about the naval bill and what is in it than a deficiency committee making a short investigation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The part of this item that the gentleman proposes to strike out is the additional sum that would be given to the department in addition to what is carried in the legislative bill, and the part that remains in is the addition to the amount that is carried in the naval bill.

Mr. SISSON. That is true; but there is no necessity for it at this time, as I conceive it, unless this committee is willing to anticipate, as the Navy Department did, that we are going to get it anyway. Let the legislation be harmonious. Let the committee of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], who has just spoken, take jurisdiction of this matter, and let him handle it and put it all in a bill together. Then you will know how many draftsmen you will need. I do not know, nor does the gentleman here know, whether they have made provisions for draftsmen in addition to the regular appropriation or not—draftsmen to take care of four, five, six, seven, or any other number of ships. They have not gone into that matter. That is a matter they decline to go into. They do not know how many ships are going to be authorized, and yet they come and ask for this sum of money.

Will they prepare plans for one, two, three, four, five, or a dozen ships that may not be authorized? They do not know. I think it is an unwise, and so far as Congress is concerned an unfair, method of spending money until you know for what ships, for how many ships, and what will be done with the money.

By the way, I do not suppose it is a very sacred thing to you gentlemen when you go to appropriate money, but it is a little sacred when you try to collect it from the people, and they have to pay it. We ought to have more regard for the Treasury than to pay out money for the employment of draftsmen that may do work upon ships that are never authorized. For example, they might expend $19,700 on plans and specifications for battleships that would never meet the approval of the Committee on Naval Affairs or of Congress, and the money would be squandered and thrown away, because Congress may not authorize the very battleships that they ask to be authorized.

For that reason I hope the committee will reduce the item down to what is actually needed under the program authorized by law and under construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Steam Engineering: For engineering, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $38,620.40.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out this item. I do not desire to discuss the matter, because the same reasons that applied to the former item apply also to this one.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to expend the two foregoing amounts for the services of draftsmen or other technical assistants for the purpose of constructing battleships Nos. 43 and 44 in certain United States navy yards and of expediting the preparation of designs, contract plans, and specifications of new vessels, being additional to the sums authorized for such personal services in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the language of this section. Beginning with line 14, after the word "yards," strike out the following language: "And of expediting the preparation of designs, contract plans, and specifications of new vessels." Strike out the language that I have read, ending with "vessels."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 21, lines 14 and 15, by striking out the following language: "And of expediting the preparation of designs, contract plans, and specifications of new vessels."

Mr. SISSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, by eliminating that language you will leave the amounts as they are, but the Navy Department would not then be authorized to use any of this money in the preparation of plans for ships not authorized by law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it might be a good thing to have a little test vote in the House. We have had a good deal of talk about those who were in favor of enlarging the Navy and getting the country in the proper state of preparation. A great deal of applause on the Democratic side was given to some few gentlemen who have spoken against preparedness. Now, we are going to have a show-down. Those who are in favor of a little Navy at this time will vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi. Those who are not in favor of a little Navy, but are in favor of some little preparation for national defense, can vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, and we will have a rising vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Alaska Engineering Commission: For carrying out the provisions of the act approved March 12, 1914 (38 Stat., p. 305), entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," to continue available until expended, $2,000,000.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, beginning on line 7, strike out all of the paragraph down to and including line 13.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to waste the time of the House in offering hopeless amendments, but inasmuch as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] succeeded a few moments ago in reducing an appropriation of $2,000,000 to $1,999,978, I am encouraged to point out to him an opportunity to make a real, substantial saving.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. COX. I want some information. What has been done under this paragraph already?

Mr. GILLETT. They have begun work there. They have expended about $2,000,000, I think, on the work. They have bought a road, you know.

Mr. COX. How much of a road did they buy? What road did they buy?

Mr. GILLETT. A road of 35 miles, I think.

Mr. COX. What did they pay for that?

Mr. STAFFORD. They have paid down $1,150,000 and the balance is $650,000.

Mr. GILLETT. They have paid, I understand, over a million dollars.

Mr. COX. Are they actually constructing the work on this road?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes. I understand they are proceeding favorably with the work. They expected that they would have to bring their labor up there, but I understand they have found the labor there, and they are at work.

My opposition to this paragraph is not on that ground.

Mr. COX. I want some information. I have not looked the matter up.

Mr. GILLETT. I am not on the subcommittee that has charge of this legislation.

Mr. COX. I understand the Government has bought 70 miles of road already. Is that correct?

Mr. LENROOT. I understand the Government has paid down $1,750,000.

Mr. COX. The Government has constructed some road in addition to what it bought, has it not? How much?

Mr. GILLETT. They have graded about 35 miles, I believe, and built about 10 miles. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] may be able to inform the gentleman exactly.

Mr. CANNON. I think they have graded about 35 miles. That is my recollection of the hearings.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not base my amendment on the ground that this work is superfluous, but regardless of the advisability of building this railroad, I simply offer to that side of the House a proposition and an opportunity of economy. When the Treasury is suffering, when we are losing millions of dollars every month, when we have recommendations for enormous emergency appropriations which must be given, there has got to be some method of providing the money. I think one method would be to cut off all kinds of luxuries, and admitting that this is desirable and most commendable, upon which I do not wish to express any opinion, yet unless that side of the House has some proposition by which they are going to bring in adequate and abundant revenue, of which I am very skeptical, I think they had better begin to save this year by cutting off luxuries.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Suppose this item is stricken from the bill, how will it affect the Government work there? Will it occasion any loss to the Government?

Mr. GILLETT. It would undoubtedly occasion some loss. The construction has begun to a certain extent. The road we bought is not in good condition, but in very poor condition. The road of 10 miles which we have constructed would probably deteriorate—it would be some loss——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. I ask, Mr. Chairman, for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would say that it would not be two millions only saved. This $2,000,000 is for work for this fiscal year, but the administration has recommended an appropriation of eight million and some hundred thousand for the next year, and consequently what is in issue here is over $10,000,000. If we are going to stop at all we had better stop now and do nothing till the Treasury has more funds, but if we are going to go on next year we had better not stop work now and begin again next year. So the only reason for adopting this amendment would be on the theory that we were going to wait until the Government had sufficient revenue to afford us the reasonable luxuries of life. It does not seem to me at the present that we are in that condition or that there is any reasonable expectation of it in the near future. I do not believe the party in power is able to put us in that condition, and so I suggest, as one of the means of helping the Treasury, to strike out this appropriation and then not continue it in the next regular appropriation, but to wait until we are in a financial condition where we can afford to spend money in hastening our territorial development.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, earlier in the day I had occasion, after the gentleman from Massachusetts had spoken, to call attention to the inadequate method of determining extravagance by using simply totals. The gentleman himself has furnished a splendid illustration of the futility of that sort of consideration. If this railroad is to be built, this money should be appropriated. Of course if the gentleman from Massachusetts believes that the railroad ought not to be built and that we have wasted what has already been done there, he is quite within his rights and reasonable in his position in denying any additional money. But for those who believe it should be built to now deny the money would not be economy, although it might make a good showing in the totals. The question of showing that seems to the gentleman the most desirable thing to accomplish irrespective of whether you have an actual economy or not. The fact is, if the work is to be economically prosecuted the money must be available now. The fact is that a good deal of material can be transported in winter over the ice cheaper than after the ice breaks up. Another fact is that you would lose economies through the dispersing of your workmen who are there now. In fact, all the reasons that would actuate a business man conducting in a businesslike way an enterprise of this kind require an appropriation for carrying on and maintaining this work. The gentleman's theory of economy consists in reducing present totals only, and I congratulate him on giving such a good illustration of what I said this morning.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky seems to think that striking out $2,000,000 is a matter of totals. It is a matter of expenditure. There are plenty of people who would like to have something but can not, first, because their salaries are too small, like ours, or for other reasons which prevent the purchase of them. I suppose that was what was in the mind of the gentleman from Massachusetts. However, Mr. Chairman, I rose to call the attention of the House to what seems to me a peculiarity in the matter of submitting an estimate. Under the law the head of a department prepares an estimate of appropriations to be submitted to Congress and then transmits it to the Secretary of the Treasury, who transmits it to the Speaker of the House. I hold three of these estimates in my hand—one for the item now under consideration of $2,000,000 for the Alaska Railroad, one for the increase in the Navy Department, which we have just been discussing, and one for the deficiency in the pay of the Army, which we were discussing a little while ago. The Army estimate comes to us signed "Lindley M. Garrison, Secretary of War," and is addressed to the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury, with no one's approval. The one for the Navy comes to us signed "Josephus Daniels," and under that "The White House, approved, January, 1916," without anyone's signature. That shows that that estimate was submitted to the President and was marked "approved" by the White House, but the President was not earnest enough about it to add his signature. The estimate for the Alaska Railroad comes to us, "The President, The White House. Earnestly approved, Woodrow Wilson."

Mr. Chairman, you can take your choice. The President does not approve the estimate for the payment for the deficiency in the pay for the Army. He approves, but will not sign, the approval for the increase in the Navy, to prepare plans for new battleships, and he "earnestly" approves the expenditure of $2,000,000 for the Alaska railroad, which, I suppose, probably unknown to him, is mainly for the purpose of paying the Guggenheims or Pierpont Morgan or some one else—I do not know who it is—for the railroad in Alaska which we have agreed to buy, and which we ought to have. I do not know just where the President draws the line, and I do not know that it is the President who draws the line. Probably he does not keep track of these things, but it does seem odd to me that, of the estimates submitted to Congress for appropriations, some of them are not submitted to the President and he does not approve, some of them he approves but does not sign the approval, and some he earnestly approves and adds his signature.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in these matters of receipts and expenditures it is interesting to note some of the difficulties which we find ourselves up against. We embarked upon the proposition of the income tax which the people did not want, and now find that in order to raise revenue we will have to continue that tax and probably extend it. Then we imposed a war tax upon the people, which nobody wanted, and now find that in order to carry out the programs that have been decided upon we must extend that war tax and continue the burden which the people do not like to bear. In the matter of the customs revenue, we find that from the point of view of the other side it is very much easier to levy a direct tax upon the people of the United States to pay for our various enterprises than it is to levy a tax at the ports of entry on the goods that are manufactured in foreign countries, thus making the foreigner pay the tax for the benefit of the consumer in the United States. In the matter of the Alaska Railroad and this appropriation we are now up against the proposition of having gone into an expensive enterprise, involving the expenditure of some $30,000,000, which at the time it was discussed in the House seemed to indicate that we were going to expend of the people's money about $1,000 for the benefit of every white man in Alaska, assuming, of course, that the money was to be for the benefit of Alaskans only.

I did not approve the project at the time it came into the House, because, it seemed to me, considering the financial status of the country and the fact that the Democratic Party was not altogether a constructive party, that we had better reserve our funds for such purposes as good roads in the United States, which we badly need for the benefit of the farmer, as we heard yesterday, and for the improvement of waterways, long neglected, before we ever suspected we had any assets in Alaska at all. I opposed the measure at the time because it seemed to me to be a project that might very well wait for a year or two until we could take care of some of our own needs in the United States, and I thought possibly the 30,000 white men up there might give in a little bit to the 100,000,000 of people in the United States proper until we got a few things here that we actually needed in the way of public improvements. But so long as we have gone into it and the majority has made itself responsible for the expenditure of at least $30,000,000 to buy these railroads that did belong to the Guggenheims and others, who were very much assailed in previous Congresses, I do not see very well how we can get out of it since we have already expended a million dollars or more and have started on the work. That which we have undertaken I suppose we ought to carry through, leaving the responsibility where it belongs.

One of my constituents, an active business man and an energetic hunter, has been in Alaska several times, and in a communication to me he has a good deal to say about the resources of Alaska. In order that his views on that subject may be set before the House, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the House by incorporating his letter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, January 13, 1916.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have made two trips to Alaska in the pursuit of big game and I contemplate going again this spring.

These journeys have opened my eyes to the enormous mineral and agricultural wealth of Alaska and of its marvelous fisheries. This Territorial wonder until recently has had but poor help from Congress; in fact, it has been harassed in many sorts of ways in place of having been helped. The last Congress, however, made a notably good start by deciding to build a Government railroad from Seward to the Tanana River, which will enable it to get to Fairbanks—the metropolis of the far North.

Now that a real start has been made to do justice to this mighty Territory, I hope that you will do what you can to push the work along.

The administration has asked Congress to appropriate $10,456,000 for Government improvements in Alaska for this year.

What little I have seen of the Alaskan Territory confirms me in the belief that with the help of Congress and of the Government, as noted above, and with the transportation facilities as now projected finally completed, a wave of unexampled prosperity is bound to set in, which will not only help Alaska itself, but it will have the reflex action of being helpful to the whole of the United States.

Since the purchase of the Territory in 1867 Alaska has given the Nation a grand total of $533,195,587, and for this enormous amount the Government has only contributed about $24,000,000 over and above the revenues collected in 47 years.

If every Member of Congress should spend, say, two or three months in the Territory and see for themselves what an untold wealth will be bound to follow the improvements now in process of being carried out, they would realize that to give Alaska her rights would in the end be productive of good to every State in the Union.

Very truly, yours,

THOMAS MARTINDALE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a statement about the Alaskan Railroad to-night. I do not want the statements that have been already made in reference to the amendment to go by without a statement of the facts.

Congress authorized the construction of a railroad in Alaska at a cost of not to exceed $35,000,000, and directed the President to select a route from some all-year open port at tidewater to the interior of Alaska on the navigable waters of Alaska, and if he determined to purchase any existing railroads in Alaska to pay not to exceed the appraised value of the railroad. The route selected is from Seward, Resurrection Bay, to Fairbanks. The Alaska Northern Railroad, 71 miles in length, from Seward to Kern Creek, a distance of 71 miles, has been purchased for $1,150,000. The work was commenced at Cooks Inlet and at Anchorage, a right of way has been graded for 35 miles, and tracks laid for a distance of 15 miles. There was available for the work $3,000,000. The money has all been expended. There are at Anchorage between 500 and 1,000 men who were engaged upon the work, and who will be reemployed if money be made available to utilize their services. An appropriation is urged at this time particularly because it is desired to carry the work from Matanuska River, a point to which the grading has been completed, a distance of 35 miles, for 40 miles farther to the Matanuska coal field, and in addition to do some work on what is to be the main line toward Fairbanks, to commence work from Ship Creek Junction along Turnagain Arm toward Kern Creek, so as to connect the Alaska Northern Railroad up with this part of the work that is being done.

If the money is now appropriated, supplies can be taken up to a supply station along the line of the Matanuska coal fields over the ice at a cost of about a cent a pound. If the money be not available until after the ice goes out, it will be necessary to pack supplies on pack horses. The limit will be about 150 pounds to an animal, and the cost will be about 8 cents a pound. A certain portion of the work can be done much better and more economically during the winter season than in the summer season. Unexpectedly favorable labor conditions enabled the commission to carry on the work much more expeditiously than was originally anticipated. Under these conditions it would seem to be the part of wisdom, if this road is to be constructed at an estimated cost of $27,000,000, to provide the money to enable the work to be done as expeditiously as possible. There are certain overhead charges which go on regardless of work being done, and the greater the force that can be employed, the greater the work that can be done with the existing organization and the more economically the work will eventually be done. It is not economy, Mr. Chairman, to deny this appropriation at this time. It would be deferring an essentially public authorized improvement to a later day at a very considerably increased cost. I can understand why my colleague on the committee favors this policy. About January, 1915, former President Taft wrote a series of articles for the Saturday Evening Post upon the efforts of his administration to effect economy in the public service. He said that in order to do so he had declined to permit to be submitted to Congress estimates for a number of very important and essential public improvements which had been authorized, which, in his opinion, should have been carried out, but in order to effect certain economies he had deferred them unto a later day; and, although this had been done, the estimates submitted by his administration during that Congress were $72,000,000 in excess of the sums actually appropriated. That is a false economy. That does not save anything. Like the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], I was one of those who did not believe the United States should commence the work of building Government railroads in Alaska.

That question has been settled. That policy has been fixed, and the wise and economical thing to do is to provide adequate funds to enable the work to be completed as rapidly as possible. Within 18 months it is anticipated that the Matanuska coal field, to which the work is to be carried under this appropriation, will be opened up, and this coal is the coal which has been examined, analyzed, and determined to be particularly valuable for the use of the Navy. Certain select portions of the coal lands are to be reserved for the Government, and the more speedily this coal becomes available the more quickly can very considerable savings be effected in the cost of fuel for the Navy upon the Pacific coast.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Let us go home.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I wanted to ask whether or not the Matanuska coal was not the coal that the Navy tests proved to be not sufficiently powerful to use in the Navy?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There were two expeditions to this coal field. The results of the first tests were not satisfactory. It was said that the coal had been taken in such quantities and in such a way that a fair test had not been possible. The result of the second test is that the coal is of a very fine quality and adequate for naval purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. Was there not a statement made at the time these coal tests were made to the effect that all warships were being built now to consume oil instead of coal, and that coal would not any longer be a factor?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There were statements to that effect, but the great bulk of the naval vessels now use coal. The cost of transporting coal from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific seaboard is very much in excess of the value of the coal itself.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree, if they are going to use coal, they should have that coal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We contribute $6,000,000 annually for the transportation of coal. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARRISON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 7617, the good-roads bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the road bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I shall not object. This is the second time we have granted leave to our distinguished friend from Indiana to-day to extend remarks, but they are always good.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the dyestuffs situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the dyestuffs situation. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 81. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis Mr. Carlos Hevia y Reyes Gavilán, a citizen of Cuba; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. J. Res. 80. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point René W. Pintó y Wentworth, a citizen of Cuba; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR SUNDAY, JANUARY 23.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to preside next Sunday at the memorial exercises for the late Representative GOULDEN.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, January 21, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 21, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Joseph H. Crooker, D. D., of Boston, Mass., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God our Father, we worship Thee as the Maker of heaven and earth. We praise Thee as the Creator of all tribes and peoples. We honor Thee as the Ruler of all nations. We thank Thee most gratefully for all the gracious blessings of our daily life. And now, as Representatives of this great Nation here assembled in Congress, we ask for the guidance of Thy spirit, even the spirit of Jesus Christ, that we may enact wise laws; that we may promote and protect the sacred privileges of our glorious country; and that we do something to establish justice more firmly throughout the world. And unto Thy great and high and glorious name we give honor, glory, and thanksgiving, now and forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATIONS FROM COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the resignation of a member of a committee. The Clerk will report it:

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS,
Washington, January 20, 1916.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I am unable to attend to the duties as member of the Claims Committee. As chairman of the Pensions Committee I am overwhelmed with work, with a large personal correspondence besides, and I shall have to resign as a member of the Claims Committee, owing to the fact that I can not do justice to that committee.

I trust my place will be filled and my resignation accepted without delay.

Very sincerely, yours, ISAAC R. SHERWOOD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House another resignation, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1916.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Recently the House of Representatives honored me with my election to a place on the Banking and Currency Committee, and also to a place on the District of Columbia Committee, and also to a place on the Patents Committee.

Because of the work I am both inclined and compelled to do upon the Banking and Currency Committee—particularly at this session, when it has under consideration the important matter of rural credits legislation—I am not able to attend the meetings and perform my share of the work upon either the Patents Committee or the District of Columbia Committee, and I accordingly hereby tender my resignation as a member of both the Committee on Patents and the Committee on the District of Columbia, and urgently request to be relieved at once from service on either or both of said committees.

Respectfully submitted.

JOE H. EAGLE.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement from Mr. Breckinridge Jones, of St. Louis, in regard to a resolution for investigating sisal loans.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter from Mr. Breckinridge Jones, of St. Louis, on sisal loans. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9416, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, with Mr. HARRISON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9416, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the emergency caused by the infectious nature and continued spread of the destructive disease of citrus trees known as citrus canker, by conducting such investigations of the nature and means of communication of the disease, and by applying such methods of eradication or control of the disease as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary, and to pay such expense and employ such persons and means, including not exceeding $2,000 for personal services in the city of Washington, and to cooperate with such authorities of the States concerned, organizations of growers, or individuals as he may deem necessary to accomplish such purpose, $300,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. So that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] may make a short statement in reference to this canker-disease appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, Congress last winter appropriated $35,000 to enable the Department of Agriculture to initiate on a comprehensive scale the work of eliminating the citrus canker in certain States in the South. A disease of citrus fruit trees had been introduced to this country, and at the time the matter was called to the attention of Congress it was shown that the entire citrus-fruit industry was imperiled. The citrus-fruit industry in the State of Florida alone is valued at $200,000,000.

Last February or March the Legislature of Florida was in session, and, believing that this pest would be controlled and eliminated by the expenditure of $175,000, the Florida Legislature appropriated that sum. Certain fruit-growers' associations, State and local, as well as individuals, have expended large sums of money in this work.

The result of the investigations that have been made, however, discloses that it is necessary to make a systematic, organized campaign, and it is estimated that it will take at least $4,000,000 completely to eliminate this disease and protect the citrus-fruit industry of the country.

The Secretary of Agriculture submitted an estimate to the committee for the balance of the present fiscal year. It is estimated that $30,000 must be expended during each of the five months in the State of Florida, and $30,000 for the rest of the year in each of the remaining five States in which the citrus fruit trees are grown and which are affected by the pest. It seems that if any action whatever is to be taken, the appropriation should be adequate to do the work required and make the appropriation of value. The committee, accordingly, recommended the amount stated by the Department of Agriculture as necessary to carry on the work from now until the 30th of June.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] withdraws his point of order.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, on this item I want to say only a word.

This item, of course, was subject to a point of order. It was not made in committee, and it has not been made in the House. It was very fully investigated. I indorse all that the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has stated.

It is a condition that is found in its worst form in Florida. The States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, in the citrus-growing zone, also have this disease, but in a much smaller degree. It is a disease that has no respect for State lines. The Florida Legislature is not in session and will not be for a year. They have made an appropriation, which the legislature thought was sufficient, but it turns out that it was not sufficient, and many contributions have been made by private individuals. This is the critical time when the fight must be made—during the last half of the fiscal year—and it seems to me, while I am not in favor of rushing in on appropriations of this kind, that the condition is so serious and the threat so great that this estimate of the department for immediate expenditure and during the remainder of this fiscal year demands this appropriation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Insert a new paragraph after line 19, page 24:

"For the emergency caused by the prevalence and continued spread of the dangerous disease known as rabies among coyotes, wolves, and other animals in the national forests and on other public lands, by conducting such investigations of the nature and means of communication of the disease and for the destruction of wolves, coyotes, and other animals dangerous to the public health and injurious to agriculture and animal industry where the disease exists, $75,000, to be expended under the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, upon that I reserve a point of order.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, there is a very serious condition confronting the live-stock growers in the Western States through the outbreak of rabies among coyotes in California, Oregon, Nevada, and now introduced into Utah. The disease is rapidly spreading, and the Department of Agriculture is doing its best under the appropriations made for the fiscal year, but that appropriation is not sufficient. The matter has been placed before the Secretary of Agriculture, and he recommends that an emergency appropriation of $75,000 be made in order to enable him to more successfully cope with this danger that is menacing the live-stock industry and the health and safety of the people. In this connection I would like to have the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture read, which officially sets out the conditions which demand the appropriation asked for. No one should require any further argument as to the urgent necessity for this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, January 12, 1916.

Hon. JOSEPH HOWELL,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HOWELL: I have your letter of January 6 concerning the rabies situation in Oregon, California, Nevada, and parts of Utah.

Rabies among coyotes and other wild animals in the Northwestern States appears to have originated in northeastern Oregon or southeastern Washington about 1910. Since that time it has spread toward the south through southeastern Oregon, northeastern California, Idaho, and Nevada, and is now threatening Utah. Reports agree that people and also many domestic animals have been bitten. There appear to be considerable losses of live stock. The animals in which rabies were reported to have developed in that region are dogs, coyotes, cats, horses, cattle, sheep, and hogs.

The area in which rabies is now known to be present among coyotes covers a distance of approximately 400 miles from north to south and 250 miles from east to west. It is likely that the area will extend. It would be impracticable completely to destroy coyotes from this area, or even from a portion of it, in a short time without an expenditure that would probably be prohibitive. It is thought that the coyotes can be killed in sufficient numbers to reduce the danger from them, provided the State authorities will at the same time adopt adequate measures of control, such as a drastic muzzling law for dogs and the proper control of other domestic animals.

The appropriation act for the Department of Agriculture for 1916 carried an item of $280,000 for certain general purposes and provided that of this amount not less than $125,000 shall be used on the national forests and public domain in destroying wolves, coyotes, and other animals injurious to agriculture and animal husbandry. Under this appropriation the Western States have been divided into districts, each in charge of an inspector who is employing a force of hunters and trappers to destroy coyotes and other predatory animals. The work is being conducted in Utah, Nevada, Idaho, California, Oregon, and Washington. Owing to the extent of the rabies epidemic in Nevada the number of hunters employed in that State has been increased to 50. In all the States mentioned the employees of the department are cooperating, so far as possible, with local officials. The amount available for attacking the rabies problem is small and inadequate, and the plans already made exhaust our available funds. We can not discontinue the work we are now doing in the general field. In fact, our plans have progressed so far as to make it impracticable to abandon them, and, furthermore, the wording of the authorization would seem to preclude the department from devoting the entire appropriation to the destruction of coyotes. If the rabies situation is to be attacked properly, an emergency appropriation will have to be made. The department probably could efficiently expend for this purpose in the neighborhood of $75,000 by the beginning of the next fiscal year, and the experts are of the opinion that a continuing appropriation of $200,000 might result in such a reduction of the coyotes as to confer great relief, provided, of course, as I have stated, the States cooperate satisfactorily.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, at a live-stock convention, held in Salt Lake on the 15th of this month, at which delegates from the surrounding States were in attendance, notice was taken of this condition, and the following resolution was adopted:

Whereas for many years the loss of sheep and lambs from the depredations of wild animals has proved a menace to the prosperity of western sheepmen; and

Whereas there exists at this time in several of the Western States a dangerous disease known as rabies, affecting the coyote, making this animal perfectly fearless and a dangerous menace to all classes of live stock and poultry (30 head of feeding young steers having been bitten in one feed yard, as reported by a representative of the Biological Survey). Also a dangerous menace to all human beings, especially women and children. Thirty-three persons, as reported by the same authority, are now being treated at Reno, Nev., having been bitten by affected animals: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we urgently request all flockmasters to devote a portion of their time to the eradication of these dangerous pests, and that we petition Congress at the present session for an appropriation of $500,000 to be used by the Biological Survey in the eradication of predatory wild animals.

Mr. Chairman, the live-stock interests pay into the Treasury of the United States over a million dollars a year for grazing privileges on the national forests. The Government owns and controls more than 80 per cent of the territorial area where this disease is prevalent. It seems to me that it is a condition that calls for the careful consideration of the House because it not only affects, disastrously, the live-stock interests but it menaces and threatens the health and lives of the people. We feel that we have a claim that ought to appeal to the sense of justice and fairness of the House.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. What is the method employed in using this money to combat this disease?

Mr. HOWELL. The only method now employed is the employment of hunters in cooperation with various States to go out and kill these animals. My amendment proposes that the department shall take into consideration the adoption of other successful means by which these animals can be destroyed and the disease eradicated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly inform the committee what action the State has taken toward the eradication of this pest?

Mr. HOWELL. Recently there was held a convention of live-stock growers in my State, in connection with a convention of the various boards of health convened by the governor, where the imminent danger of this disease spreading in Utah was fully discussed and rigid regulations adopted to prevent, as far as possible, the spread of this deadly disease.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much money has been spent for this purpose?

Mr. HOWELL. In my own State there is an annual tax of 4 mills on sheep and goats and 2 mills on horses and cattle, which constitutes a county fund for this purpose. In addition to that there is an appropriation of $20,000 annually from the State funds to be used for this purpose.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether the States have authority to go into the national forests for this purpose? I suppose they might if they got the permit, but would they otherwise?

Mr. HOWELL. I am unable to answer that question. The rangers are all engaged in killing these animals on national forests, as far as they can. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not withdraw the point of order. If it were a matter that the department was interested in, it should have made an estimate and sent it to Congress for the money necessary to carry on its public work. If the purpose is to induce Congress to make appropriations by addressing communications to individuals of Congress, it is time it was ascertained. The citrus-fruit matter came before the committee without an estimate by the department. I stated to the gentlemen interested that the committee would not act on the matter unless the department submitted an estimate. None was transmitted, and the statement was made that however desirable it might be the department would not ask Congress to appropriate the money. There was a change of mind and the estimate came. The department has boasted at times that Congress has forced money upon it which the department did not desire, whereas the combined energies of the department were engaged in an effort to induce Congress to appropriate money for certain purposes without complying with the laws with reference to submitting estimates. If the department believes that this appropriation is desirable, it has ample time to submit an estimate and have it considered here and at the other end of the Capitol in a proper way before this bill becomes a law. Under the circumstances I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, before we leave this item of Bureau and Plant Industry I would like to offer an amendment, as follows:

Provided, That no part of this money shall be used to pay the cost or value of trees or other property destroyed in the work of investigating or eradicating this disease.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman that that amendment is not necessary, because there is no authority to do that. The amendment is so framed that the authority would not be conferred on the department, and, furthermore, the department does not desire the authority, because it is opposed to spending money in that way.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Is the gentleman sure that the paragraph is so drawn that it is not subject to the construction I put upon it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That matter was considered in the committee.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman from New York knows, as many others do, that there is a persistent demand for money to be used for the very purpose I speak of.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The authority was requested, and a provision was framed which gave that authority; but the department did not submit it in that form and does not wish the authority and does not desire to expend money for the reimbursement of property.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The provision now in the bill is:

For the emergency caused by the infectious nature and continued spread of the destructive disease of citrus trees known as citrus canker, by conducting such investigations of the nature and means of communication of the disease, and by applying such methods of eradication or control of the disease as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary, and to pay such expense and employ such persons and means—

And so forth.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but that is all limited by the previous wording, which authorizes investigation of methods of eradication and control.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. But in lines 12 and 13 we find the following language:

And by applying such methods of eradication or control of the disease as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary.

A delegation from the State of Florida and from other States where citrus fruit is grown appeared before the Committee on Agriculture in one of the early days of this session, and one of their suggestions—yes; one of their insistent demands—was that money in large amounts should be appropriated by the Federal Government for the purpose of paying the value of orchards destroyed, and to reimburse owners of orchards for losses they sustain by the activities of the department and the State authorities in checking the advance of the disease, those methods being partly the destruction of orchards some of which have not yet been affected by the disease.

It is clear enough to me that if this appropriation is made just as it stands an effort will be made to have a part of the money devoted to paying owners of orchards for property destroyed, and if there is any question whatever about the construction to be put upon this paragraph, it ought to be made clear. The amendment I suggest should be added so that it will be clear what the intention of the Congress is, and outline clearly the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture and the limits of his authority as to the use of this money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The same gentlemen appeared before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I should like the privilege of offering the amendment so that fuller consideration may be given to the construction of this section, and as to the advisability of making sure the manner in which this money is to be used.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to recur to this paragraph to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not think the gentleman from Michigan is asking unanimous consent for anything of that kind, Mr. Chairman. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The amendment having been offered as a new paragraph——

Mr. MANN. A new paragraph being offered does not prevent going back to the paragraph under consideration.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Personally, so that there will be no misunderstanding, the committee is unanimous that no money should be expended for the purpose mentioned.

Mr. MANN. I am not at all sure that the appropriation ought to prevent the expenditure of money for the value of orchards which it may be necessary to destroy in order to prevent the disease being spread.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am. I am very positive about it from the information at hand and for this reason: The information is that in some rare instances it is considered desirable to destroy a few trees in the vicinity of an affected tree which are not affected, but which, as a matter of precaution, it is thought should be destroyed in order to destroy the germs in the surrounding soil. If an individual owns a grove of trees and there are one or two trees in it that are affected, if those trees are not destroyed his entire grove will eventually be destroyed. If to protect his entire property it is deemed advisable to destroy a few sound trees that are not yet affected the owner will have received such an enormous benefit from the destruction of those few trees in the preservation of his entire grove that there would not be any justification, in my opinion, for the Federal Government to reimburse him for the value of those trees.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am not so sure about that. I take it that the department would have the authority, as they have in the foot-and-mouth disease, under this appropriation, to probably pay all or, under the practice, a part of the value of affected trees which are destroyed. But it might readily happen that it would be a matter of precaution, a policy more wise to adopt, to destroy some trees which are not affected in order to prevent the spread of the disease, rather than to wait until the disease affects a large number of trees and then destroy them. I am not sufficiently familiar with the disease to be posted upon the subject, but I am sufficiently familiar with it to know that in the opinion of many it may be cheaper and wiser to destroy unaffected trees before they are affected rather than to wait until they are affected in large numbers, which would require the destruction of many more affected trees than the affected and unaffected trees combined in the first place. You have to stop the spread of this disease in some way. It may be that the States in the main ought to do that. That is one of the questions with which we constantly come in contact, but we have adopted all along the line the policy of giving national aid to prevent the spread of disease, which can readily pass from one State to another. This is not merely localized, although it may be local at a particular place. It can be spread, doubtless, by birds, and birds do not know State lines—just as the foot-and-mouth disease is spread. There we pay supposedly one-half of the ordinary value, not the fancy value, of cattle which are destroyed. While I do not think the cases are on all fours, or precisely alike, I can see that there might be good reason for the Government destroying orchards not affected, just as in the city of Chicago years ago, when they had the fire, they blew up houses which were not afire, just as they will do in every great conflagration—destroy property which is not yet afire in order to stop the fire. Which is it wiser to do, blow up a house to prevent the fire burning that house and many more or wait until the house is afire and the fire has spread over a large number of houses?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in the statute relating to the foot-and-mouth disease authority is specifically given to reimburse by the payment of a certain percentage of the value, I think 50 per cent. Dr. Taylor was asked whether the estimate included any allowance for the payment of trees destroyed. In reply he said:

That is not contemplated by the estimate, and the language of the estimate does not authorize reimbursement for trees destroyed.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether in his opinion line 12 does not give the department that authority? It says:

By applying such methods of eradication or control of the disease as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The demand for reimbursement is based entirely upon the practice in connection with the eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease, and in the statute which authorizes the Department of Agriculture to destroy animals specific authority is given to pay for animals destroyed. There is no such statute in this case; there is no such authority. This statute is construed to authorize the continuation of work that is now being done under it, and no demand can be made, and no demand, in my opinion, should be made from my knowledge of the facts.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion or question?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The Federal Government has no power, as I understand it, to authorize the destruction of trees. It must be done by virtue of the police power of the State. There is no power authorizing the killing of cattle. It requires legislation, and we contribute one-half for the destruction of cattle under the authority of the State; but that requires legislation specific, which was given in respect to the foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether under this language if the department can apply such methods of eradication as in its judgment is necessary, why can not they go and make an agreement with the owner of the tree that if the Government destroys it it will pay what it is worth? That is what looks to me to be the danger there.

Mr. CANNON. For this reason, that in my judgment we can not place any construction upon it that would authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to destroy and pay for the trees. I think it would require specific authority to do that thing; and, as the gentleman from New York has well said, in the hearings, they had no desire for such authority, and I apprehend that the appropriation of $300,000 will be expended otherwise than through the destruction of property. In fact, that was the belief of the committee after it expressly considered the question of putting a limitation upon the appropriation. Sometimes it is not wise to deal with matters that do not require dealing with.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The CLERK read as follows:

On page 24, after the figures "$300,000," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "no part of which shall be used to pay the cost or value of trees or other property destroyed or damaged."

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman want to discuss his amendment?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I do, if the gentleman pleases.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate what it means for me to differ from the distinguished gentlemen who have spoken as to the construction of the statute and as to the necessity of specific legislation if authority is to be conferred upon a department of the Federal Government. I do, however, differ from them as to the construction that can be put on this paragraph, the words in lines 11 and 12, "and by applying such methods of eradication or control of the disease as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary," and so forth, and to cooperate with States and organizations in the methods that they think advisable to employ. These words, I think, may be so construed as to permit of payment of some of this money to owners of trees destroyed.

Now, I know something of the move that is made to induce Congress to make this appropriation. My table has been loaded with letters from companies and individuals from the Southern States and from other parts of the country interested in the growing of citrus fruits in the Southern States, and in almost every letter there is suggestion or demand that the Government appropriate money to be used to reimburse owners of property destroyed, because the destruction of property is now thought to be one of the ways, and the principal way, of eradicating this very serious disease. As I stated a few moments ago, one day during the early part of this session of Congress a large delegation of southern gentlemen appeared before the Committee on Agriculture, whose duty it will be later in the session to recommend to Congress an appropriation for this work, and almost everyone who spoke on the subject spoke of the necessity of destroying trees and the duty of the Federal Government to reimburse owners of those trees for loss or damage inflicted upon the owner. And in almost every letter I received reference was made to the fact that the Government had pursued a policy similar to that now demanded respecting the foot-and-mouth disease, and that it was considered that this disease is somewhat similar to that, in that it affects property in more than one State, and the duty devolves upon the Federal Government, as in that case, to reimburse the owners of trees or orchards destroyed or damaged.

So, you see, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there is a movement to have Congress appropriate money for the purpose of paying the cost or value of property destroyed, and it is clearly up to this Congress now to determine whether or not it shall embark upon a policy of paying the cost of damage to crops or property wherever or whenever it is thought necessary to destroy it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the appropriation means that there may be a direct payment to the owners of these trees destroyed by the citrus canker?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I mean that, in my judgment, an effort will be made by the owners of property, or associations, or State authorities in the citrus-growing States to have the Federal Government cooperate with the States and pay all or a part of the loss imposed as the result from the destruction of citrus orchards.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was there cooperation in the matter of the chestnut blight?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There was some cooperation in the matter of the chestnut blight.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But there was no payment to the owners for losses sustained. It was simply to stay the spread of the disease.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Well, the gentleman refers to the chestnut disease, and I will tell you something of the history of that. The Federal Government was asked for an appropriation to study that disease, and if possible to learn its cause and source, and a means of overcoming and eradicating it.

The appropriation was made, and investigations were made, and it was determined by officials of the department that the only feasible method to be employed was to destroy infected trees. And that was all that could be done. For a long time officials of the Federal Government, from a highly scientific bureau, were employed in the actual physical labor of cutting down trees, and the expense of destroying the trees was paid out of money appropriated by Congress for the purpose of studying this disease. Later, Congress determined, on the recommendation of the Committee on Agriculture, to discontinue that appropriation, because the remedy had been found and because it was simply a matter of physical labor and of expense. And it is the policy of the Committee on Agriculture—it ought to be more than it is—that when the remedy has been found, and it can be applied simply by physical labor and by the outlay of money, the Government has gone as far as it ought to go; the rest should be left to the individuals or to the States in which the work is to be done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There was no suggestion in the chestnut-blight measure that the owners should be reimbursed for their loss?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There was none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No provision was made for that?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There was none.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, the gentleman is a member of the Committee on Agriculture?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER). The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman, I believe, is a member of the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I am.

Mr. CANNON. Under the rules of the House that committee has exclusive jurisdiction touching appropriations of this nature, except in this bill, which is an urgent deficiency bill, where the Committee on Appropriations has jurisdiction. Is the gentleman seeking to get an expression from the House touching reimbursement by the Federal Government for the destruction of trees in advance of the consideration by the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I will say to the gentleman that is not exactly my purpose. I consider the pending provision defective, in its present form dangerous, so have offered this amendment to correct the trouble. I think it is the duty of a Member who has given thought to this matter and sees the defect in the bill to call attention of the House to it. It is an important matter, a question of whether or not this Government is going to embark upon the policy of reimbursing owners for almost any loss they may suffer on account of failure of crops or from disease that may attack them.

The door has been opened, Mr. Chairman, by the course pursued by the officials of the Department of Agriculture, perhaps on the authority of Congress, to assist in reimbursing owners of cattle destroyed on account of being afflicted with the foot-and-mouth disease. Now, in my judgment, the two cases are not parallel. It was urged in justification for the use of money for reimbursing owners of cattle that it is an interstate question, that cattle are shipped in interstate commerce, and, therefore, it is proper for the Government to make such regulations and incur such expense as is necessary to protect interstate commerce. There may be some foundation for this contention, but that reason or excuse for use of money in paying for animals will not apply here. This is not an interstate matter. It does not become interstate, Mr. Chairman, simply because the disease appears in more than one State or because by infection or contagion the disease may be carried from one State to another. There is no interstate commerce in orange or lemon trees. There is no danger of spreading this disease if the fruit, the products of these groves or orchards, goes into interstate commerce. The disease is not spread in that way; the products of these orchards and groves and fields are not sent into States where the citrus-fruit industry is carried on. They are sent into States where the industry is not carried on and into which there is no danger of spreading this disease.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Suppose in the effort on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture to exterminate this disease this appropriation is made, and he should find it necessary to go into Florida and order the destruction of entire orchards or groves?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I will say to the gentleman that the Secretary of Agriculture has no authority, and it can not be conferred upon him, to order destruction of these trees. He might recommend as a method of staying the ravages and possibly of ultimately eradicating the disease, that the infected trees, or near-by trees, be destroyed. He has no authority to order the destruction of the trees. That authority, if it exists at all, rests with the States.

Mr. AUSTIN. Suppose the State and Federal authorities found that it was absolutely necessary to destroy an orange grove in order to arrest the spread of this disease, could any of this money be used for that purpose?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I fear it could be, as the bill now stands. The demand will be made by individuals and authorities of the States for the use of money for that very purpose, and if the Secretary of Agriculture by any construction would be authorized to use the money for that purpose it would be used. The purpose of my amendment is to forbid it, and make impossible the use of money for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object. I am going to support the amendment. There is no use of taking more time.

Mr. AUSTIN. We want some information on this side of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This debate will never be stopped——

Mr. MANN. It is a very important matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman already has had considerable time. I hope he will not ask for more.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to encourage some of the members of other committees.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This discussion may take all day if it goes on this way, because of the interest of Members in States affected. It is not necessary. This amendment does not do any more than to carry out what was contemplated when the appropriation was made.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will save any time by denying us the right of full discussion.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal in what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] has said on the question of paying for the destruction of these trees. The committee considered that question very carefully at the time they put this item in, and while the members of the committee did not deem the proposed amendment necessary, I do not think they have any particular objection.

As I understand it, no cure has been found, so far, for this citrus canker that has gotten into the citrus groves of this country and has rapidly spread over four or five of the States that have citrus groves. The only way that has been found to control it is to absolutely burn the infected trees—to destroy them by fire. Men go in there, as I understand, especially equipped with suits, and burn every portion of the tree with an oil spray or gas spray, or something of that kind, which destroys the entire tree. It may be that they will destroy more trees than is necessary in order to make a safety zone.

The only reason this amendment was not put in was because it might interfere with the purpose of the appropriation in cooperating with various States and institutions that are carrying on this work. But we have no power to pay for trees or to destroy trees except by a contract or agreement.

The only way we destroyed any cattle was under the police power of the State, and in cooperation with the State, or by an agreement with the owner. Under this law we would have no power. I take it that we may recognize by this amendment that Congress might have the power to pay for the destruction of this property which it does not have. Outside of that, I do not see any objection to the amendment. I think the Government ought to cooperate promptly in eradicating this citrus canker. If we do not do it promptly, we will lose a great deal of the benefits of cooperation.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. There was no purpose on the part of the committee to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to utilize any portion of this appropriation in the payment of damages for destroyed orchards?

Mr. BORLAND. We thought we would leave that question entirely to the Committee on Agriculture. We were asked merely to give an emergency appropriation to cooperate with the States and organizations, which had exhausted the funds which had been given them by the State legislatures and could not at this time secure additional appropriations. We are only to cooperate with them in the work that they are now carrying on. We did not feel that at this time we could regulate or control the character of the work in which they would embark. But if the Committee on Agriculture entered upon a general policy, that committee would be the one to provide a substantive law to regulate it.

Mr. REAVIS. Was it not the purpose of the committee to leave it within the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture as to whether any part of the appropriations should be used in the payment of damages for destroyed orchards?

Mr. BORLAND. No; it was to be used simply to help out the efforts of the local organizations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] is a very proper one. The only difficulty is that it does not go far enough. The gentleman's amendment, if it were adopted, would prevent the use of these moneys in payment for trees destroyed, but the amendment would not prevent the laying of a claim at any time in the future against the Federal Government for the trees so destroyed.

There is just one way whereby the Federal Government may be relieved from responsibility, and that is by an amendment to this section, under which no part of the appropriation shall be used for the destruction of trees except upon the order of the State authorities.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has suggested that in no event will the Federal authorities have the power or the right to destroy trees unless the local authorities allow it to be done. And yet I feel quite confident that the gentleman would not support an amendment which clearly and definitely provided that no part of the appropriation should be used for the destruction of trees until the local authorities had ordered it done. Such an amendment ought to be adopted. Such an amendment is a proper recognition of the rights of the States; and if such an amendment were adopted, there would be no question about any future claim against the Federal Government for the destruction of trees.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to say that in reporting this appropriation it was the purpose of the committee to make no provision for the payment of destroyed trees. Inquiry was made as to whether the estimate contemplated such a purpose, or whether the department desired to make such payments. The answer was that the department did not desire to make such payments, and the estimate did not cover such authority.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TOWNER. No. I wanted to occupy time in my own right, five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest to the gentleman to wait until I finish. The gentleman should not interrupt me in the middle of a sentence, to take the floor from me. I may have some views of my own.

Mr. TOWNER. I thought the gentleman had concluded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to take up very much of the time of the committee in discussing the matter. I prefer to eliminate all doubt as to the purpose of Congress in making this appropriation by adopting the amendment proposed.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, it may be that the gentleman from New York can eliminate all difficulty by admitting that this amendment ought to pass. However, I do not agree with him. I do not think that this amendment ought to pass. I believe you will hamper the efforts of the administration of the Department of Agriculture under this provision of the law if you pass this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt whatever that under the terms of this bill it will be perfectly proper for the Secretary of Agriculture, or those acting under him, to go down into the citrus-fruit country and purchase an orchard that may be along the line of the advance of this citrus-fruit disease. It may be within his power under the terms of this bill to go there and purchase such an orchard and destroy it, and, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment he ought to have that power. Certainly, if that may be considered as a probable or a possible method for the eradication of the disease, the Secretary of Agriculture ought to have the right to experiment and determine whether or not the destruction of certain trees might not stop the advance of this terrible disease; and yet if this amendment should be adopted the Secretary of Agriculture will be estopped from using that method.

Mr. Chairman, I judge that we want the Secretary of Agriculture to use any and all methods that in his wisdom may be deemed best for the purpose of stopping the further spread of this calamity, that may mean the loss of hundreds of millions of dollars to the South and that may mean the absolute ruin of a great many families.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the Secretary of Agriculture ought to have the right, if he so desires, to go down into that country and purchase any of these orchards that he desires, and make any experiments that he thinks will be best for the purpose of determining how to stop the ravages of this disease. If it shall mean the destruction of the trees that he may purchase—and that is the only way in which he could destroy them—then let it be done. I have no fear that this money will be expended in any other way than legitimately for the purpose of honestly trying to see what effective methods can be put into operation for eradicating this pest. Therefore, I am against the adoption of this amendment that would, in my judgment, seriously hamper the department in its endeavor to ascertain and put in operation the most effective means to stamp out the disease and save to the South and to the Nation the citrus-fruit industry.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree at all with the statement just made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. The proposition involved is a good deal bigger than $300,000, and, in point of fact, bigger than what might be involved in many times that sum. Stripped of its particular application it is this: Shall the Federal Government, when it intervenes to do a benevolent thing for a locality, be charged not only with the cost of doing that thing, but also be required to compensate the man who happens to suffer from the particular misfortune, in this incident the ravages of a disease affecting his trees?

Mr. TOWNER rose.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, just a minute. I have only five minutes, and I would like to state my side of the case.

Mr. TOWNER. I will not ask the gentleman the question which I had in mind.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is no reason in the world, except the stubbornness of individual men or the parsimony of States, why the Federal Government should be called upon to reimburse owners for the destruction of trees. Why is the Federal Government going in there? Is it going there for its own benefit primarily? No; it is going there because these localities are appealing to it to help them in solving a situation which involves their property. Now, it is exceedingly unfortunate when men find some of their property destroyed through no fault of theirs. It would be very unfortunate for them if they lost their property by fire or if they lost their fruit trees by a killing frost; but if this Government is not only going to take the position of aiding with its intelligence and with its experts in helping to eradicate a particular disease, but is also going to the point of reimbursing the people for the loss that they suffer, then we are entering upon a domain that will tax the capacity of any Government, no matter how rich it may be.

I submit that instead of the amendment going too far, it does not go far enough. If it were practicable at this time, I would like to see an amendment which would require that no tree should be destroyed until the owner thereof agreed that he would make no claim upon the Government. Now, what is the situation that has grown up out of the foot-and-mouth disease? Take the situation in my very State of Kentucky, where a number of very valuable cattle were destroyed. The Government of the United States has paid its half, and so far the State of Kentucky has not paid its half to the citizens of Kentucky, for the destruction of that property. Now, what does that mean? It means just what I spoke of yesterday, that all the time the States are talking about rights and are ignoring duties. They are trying to unload upon Uncle Sam the burden of taking care of the things which primarily belong to them to take care of. I want to use the intelligence of the Department of Agriculture in helping to stamp out this disease, but I am unwilling to see this Government taxed with what will amount to several million dollars by way of paying for trees that may be destroyed.

Why, the gentlemen who came before the committee in this matter did not ask for $300,000. They asked for two or three million dollars, and we have seen a propaganda over this country, extending to every part of it. Every merchant who had any trade down South with any people who were affected has been written to, and in turn has written to Members of Congress, in order to start a back fire to compel us to appropriate great sums of money. I think the Government goes to the extreme limit of generosity when it furnishes the funds to enable its experts to do down there, and by their advice and aid help these people to stop the ravages of this disease; but to say that we must go further, and compensate every individual who is unfortunate enough to suffer a loss, is to say that we are to enter a realm of paternalism beyond the dreams of anybody in America heretofore. We might as well undertake to insure all citizens against loss that may happen through no fault of theirs, whether it relates to trees, or property, or what not, and that is a theory of government that I will never agree to. For my part, I hope the amendment will be adopted, and I shall vote for it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To equip the new chemical laboratory building, including the construction, purchase, and installation of chemical desks, hoods, cases, special furniture, and other necessary equipment, including personal services in the District of Columbia, $35,000, to continue available during the fiscal year 1917.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have been called from the Hall of the House several times and missed a few paragraphs. I want to ask the gentleman from New York to look back at line 21, page 22, the item which relates to the Postal Service. Will he advise the House whether that appropriation "for regulation screen or other wagon service, $25,000," has anything to do with pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It does not pertain in any way to curtailment of the existing contracts for the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am much obliged to the gentleman. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses: For contingent expenses, including the same objects specified under this head in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $20,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The contingent expenses of the Steamboat Service should cover the question of steamboat inspection. There has been some doubt in the minds of the American people whether the Steamboat-Inspection Bureau of the Department of Commerce has performed its duty in the way in which it should be performed. Last summer we had a terrible catastrophe in Chicago in which more than 1,000 lives were lost. The Secretary of Commerce came to Chicago during the investigation that was had in connection with that disaster, and he conducted himself there in such a way as to give everybody reason to believe that he was not in sympathy with a thorough inspection of steamboats.

The people of Chicago were appalled as a result of this disaster, and yet in the face of all the death and sorrow and suffering which resulted from that, it was apparent that no sympathetic ear was given to the people who were interested in protecting the lives of those who travel on steamboats by anybody connected with the Department of Commerce, and particularly that branch known as the Steamboat-Inspection Service. The hearings before the Committee on Appropriations in connection with this suggested appropriation indicated that this $20,000 is requested because of the number of additional ships that have been transferred from the foreign to the American flag. But there is no indication of any evidence in the hearings that any account has been taken of the needs of the service where life should be protected.

The statement made by those who came before the committee for this appropriation was to the effect that if they did not receive more money the sailing of the ships would be delayed. There was no suggestion from anyone in power as to the need for better protection of life. The people of the community from which I come feel justly aggrieved at the attitude of the Department of Commerce in the investigation caused to be made of this appalling disaster.

[The time of Mr. MADDEN having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

We feel that the time has come when public officials in high places should be in sympathy with the people of America, and particularly in cases of the kind I have described.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; for a question.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman is not going to ask for an appropriation to pay damages for the loss of lives on the Eastland?

Mr. MADDEN. We are not going to ask for any appropriation, but we are going to ask for decent treatment by the officials of the Department of Commerce. [Applause.] When the people of a community are appalled by such a disaster as Chicago witnessed they expect their public servants, when they come to the community, to treat the people of the community with decency and respect [applause] and give some evidence of their sympathy with the sorrows of the people of that community.

I want now and here to protest against the attitude of the Secretary of Commerce in his investigation into the conditions that surrounded the disaster, and I want the executive branch of the Government having control over steamboat inspection to see that that inspection work is organized and carried on in the future so as to protect the lives of the American people. I want Secretary Redfield to know that we in Chicago, at least, do not approve of his attitude during the time that this investigation was being made by him, and if we had our way we would ask for his resignation from the Cabinet on account of the insulting attitude he assumed toward the people who had wives, daughters, brothers, and sisters lying dead on the decks where this terrible disaster occurred. We want Mr. Redfield to know that he is only an individual, and that as an individual, a member of the Cabinet though he be, he is still a servant of the people, and we expect him to give the people whose servant he is the evidence of his sympathetic feeling and that character of feeling that the master has a right to expect from a man. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there is no justification for the very severe assault made on the Secretary of Commerce. The Eastland disaster in Chicago was a most unfortunate one. A large number of women and children who had boarded an excursion steamer lost their lives. My recollection is that it was due to the fact that the water at the wharf where the steamer was tied up was quite shoal, and the officers in charge of the boat had emptied the water ballast tanks, so as to lie alongside this particular wharf.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In just a moment. So when a large number of persons went on the boat and got upon one side the boat careened, overturned, and a large number lost their lives. At any rate, whatever may have been the actual cause of the disaster, as soon as it was known the Secretary of Commerce, believing that it was a disaster of appalling extent, personally went to the city of Chicago with a number of his assistants in order to ascertain, if it could be ascertained, just what caused the disaster and who, if anyone, was responsible for it. The conditions in Chicago were not as calm and placid as they would be under ordinary circumstances. The Secretary and his assistants were very much misunderstood, maligned, and abused by the people whom he was attempting to serve.

Mr. MADDEN. We deny that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There were brought to Chicago from different parts of the United States steamboat inspectors who had no local interest whatever and were supposed to be entirely free from any bias or prejudice resulting from location, in order to make an exhaustive investigation and ascertain what the facts actually were. That investigation was conducted. A report has been made and transmitted to the Speaker of this House, and it is now an official document of the House of Representatives. As a result of that report, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] and his committee have reported a bill to add the necessary employees in the Steamboat-Inspection Service.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, that report, with the testimony taken, was referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and the report and all the testimony taken by the board in Chicago have been printed by the committee and are now available to any Member who may be interested in the facts. A bill has also been introduced, by request of the Secretary of Commerce, and is pending before the committee, on which hearings will be had in the near future, providing for the creation of a board of naval architects to superintend the construction of ships, the better to safeguard their stability and seaworthiness. The immediate cause of that disaster has never been officially ascertained. Judge Landis, United States district judge at Chicago, took the investigation out of the hands of the Steamboat-Inspection Service and had the witnesses all subpœnaed before the Federal grand jury and forbade the Steamboat-Inspection Service, under penalty of contempt of court, to further call these witnesses before them or proceed with the investigation. For that reason it was halted and only a partial investigation has been made. If the facts warrant, a congressional investigation may be made; but I think that in connection with this bill all of the material facts connected with that unfortunate and appalling disaster will be developed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, those who are acquainted with the Secretary of Commerce know that whatever differences men may have with him because of his political affiliations, he is a man of integrity, intelligence, high purpose, and desires to perform the duties of his great office to the very best of his ability. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is not surprising that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], if he had his way, would ask him to resign from the Cabinet. Mr. Chairman, if he had his way he would have every Democratic member of the Cabinet resign or eliminated in any way possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I feel that owing to the fact that I have known the Secretary of Commerce for over 20 years, I can not allow to go unchallenged the statements made about his investigation of the Eastland disaster. I wish to add my word to that of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] in commendation of the high character of the Secretary of Commerce. Though we may differ with him at times, as the gentleman from New York said, on his political opinions or convictions, I know him to be a man of exceptionally high character, and I can not for a moment allow to go without a challenge the statement that he would be hard-hearted or adamant to the sufferings of anybody, much less women and children. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I take exception to any general statement about any man—be he a Member of this House or a member of the Cabinet, be he of high or low degree. I think that when a statement is made about a man it should be backed up by particulars and that generalizations should not be accepted as true.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I will back up the statement with particulars by asking an investigation. That is what we wish, and we will prove the statement that I made to be true.

The Clerk read as follows:

Claims for damages: To pay the claims for damages which have been considered, adjusted, and determined to be due to the claimants by the Commissioner of Lighthouses, under authority of the provisions of section 4 of the act of June 17, 1910 (36 Stats., p. 537), on account of damages occasioned by collision for which vessels of the Lighthouse Service have been found responsible, certified to Congress at its present session in House Document No. 541, $53.39.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 2, on page 27, add the following:

"Rural sanitation: For special studies of, and demonstration work in, rural sanitation, including personal service, to continue available during the fiscal year 1917, $100,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to this extent, that it can not be introduced as a new section in the middle of another section. There is but one section to this bill.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer it as a new paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Then I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, this item was estimated for, and was before the subcommittee. The subcommittee differed with me about the item and it went out of the bill. The purpose of the item is to enable the Medical Department of the Government to establish a system of rural inspection, notably for the purpose of enabling the Government to successfully stamp out pellagra, the horrible disease which the Medical Department shows to exist in 44 of the 48 States of the Union. In the single State of South Carolina last year there were reported 56,000 cases. The medical authorities of the Government have stated the only cure for this disease is that the proper diet be given to the patient. Therefore, the purpose is to enable people to know how to prepare properly the food diet, to know what a well-balanced meal is.

The object of this appropriation is to take typical counties, and in cooperation with the health authorities of the State and county, make that county free from any of those conditions which would tend to produce disease. If the work which the Agricultural Department does as a whole is within the power and scope of the Federal Government, then, indeed, this work could be done by the Federal Government if in the wisdom of Congress it is a proper item of expense, because I do not believe the authority would be questioned now, although in the past it has been questioned, in reference to the Agricultural Department. All of the activities of that department are directed along lines similar to this in reference to crops, soil improvement, the proper care of animals, and unquestionably, if that is true, then the Health Department of the Government can, as a matter of education, as a matter of proper direction for the State authorities to follow, make such suggestions and aid and assist in this work. I do not know, nor can you find from any of the authorities, the number of cases of pellagra in the United States—it is in 44 of the 48 States—and as a matter of economy, as a matter of good business, this appropriation should be made, because that which tends to preserve the health of the people tends to promote their business activities and success. In the great cities where they have a congested population they have a thorough city inspection and sanitation, and the city authorities look after the matter. It pays there and it will pay in the country. It is not intended here that the Federal Government should establish the sanitation, but that they should aid and assist in endeavoring to get the people informed of what is proper sanitation around the country home. As soon as that is established the matter is taken up by the State and county authorities and they then continue the work of sanitation. What would become of the great cities if each home owner were left to himself?

If it were not for the fact that they have city health authorities who looked after the sanitation of premises and have the right to cause the owners of the premises to make them sanitary, the health of the city would be much impaired and the death rate greatly increased.

Now, as a beginning, information which the medical department of this Government has obtained in reference to country sanitation, in reference to the preservation of life, in reference to the discovery of diseases that are brought about by germ or infection—such information given to the various health bodies of the counties and States by the Department of Health in Washington would be a great step toward getting a proper rural sanitation through the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to discuss the point of order. I simply want to express the appreciation of the people of the State of Mississippi, particularly, and I think that is true of the other Southern States, of the great work which has been done by the Public Health Service, particularly that under the direction of Dr. Goldberger. This disease—pellagra—is of relative recent appearance in our part of the country; and while the doctors say it is not contagious, it has spread to an alarming extent and is a most deadly disease.

Dr. Goldberger, of the Public Health Service, three years ago began an investigation of it, and by a diligent, persistent, and scientific investigation he has practically demonstrated that pellagra can be prevented and can be cured.

That discovery, while it will save thousands of lives in the State of Mississippi and the other Southern States, will also add materially to the prosperity of those States by the prevention of the further spread of this disease.

I take this much time simply to pay this well-deserved compliment to Dr. Goldberger. I do not care to discuss the point of order at all.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am in thorough sympathy with the work done by the Public Health Service, a service which has always been a sort of pet of mine ever since I have been in Congress. In the last Congress the House passed a bill to give to the Public Health Service authority over rural sanitation. That bill did not become a law. Such a bill is now pending in the House before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. If that bill does become a law, then there will be authority of law for making this appropriation. There is no such authority now. That is one of the points of order I make. Another which I make, and which I know will appeal to my friend from Mississippi, is that orderly procedure in the consideration of appropriations is always desirable and required by the rules. This is a deficiency appropriation bill, and it provides under the heading of the Department of State for various deficiencies in the State Department. It provides under the heading of the Treasury Department for various deficiencies in the Treasury Department, among which is an item for the Public Health Service, and it provides for deficiencies in other departments until it gets down to the Department of Commerce, and in the middle of the paragraph relating to the Department of Commerce this amendment is offered for a deficiency in the Public Health Service, which is in the Treasury Department. It has no place in the bill. If it should be inserted in the bill in this place it would be an item of expenditure under the Department of Commerce and the Lighthouse Service for a bureau which is in the Treasury Department, and the Chair has always held every time such a question arose that gentlemen who wish to offer amendments on an appropriation bill must offer them in the appropriate place. The appropriate place for this amendment to be offered was on page 18, in line 5, and as we are now on page 27, in the Department of Commerce, following the Lighthouse Service, and just preceding the Department of Labor, the amendment is not in order in this place in the bill, and, there being no authority of law, would not be in order in any other place.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any authority of law for this appropriation, but I will state that the reason this amendment is not offered in the proper place in this bill is that I was not in the Chamber at the proper time, because the legislative bill was being considered, and I was in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, and that item had been passed when I came in. If no point of order is made and it is adopted, I will ask unanimous consent to put it in at the proper place in the bill, if the gentleman will give me an opportunity to take a vote on it, and I think the gentleman should not insist upon that point of order unless it is because he is opposed to the item.

Mr. MANN. I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to inserting this item in this bill at this time at any place. I am in favor of passing a law, by the way, giving the Health Bureau the right to do this service.

Mr. SISSON. I will state for the benefit of the committee that there are a number of gentlemen who have been engaged in this work, as I understand, on another appropriation carried under another head, but that appropriation is a very small one, and the medical department has organized a number of young physicians, who have been through a course here in the city of Washington, and not to give them this money at this time would mean that this would cease. But if they can get the $100,000 at this time, and Congress will pass the law which the gentleman has in mind, then there would not have to be a complete reorganization of the service again.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the reason I make the point of order on this paragraph is because I think the departments of the Government should recognize the fact that when Congress makes an appropriation for a particular purpose it is their duty to expend it during the fiscal year and not to organize a service which will expend it in a few months, and then come to Congress and say, "We have this service organized under an appropriation which has been made, and if you do not give us more money than you intended our service will be demoralized and disorganized." That is not the province of the departments of the Government. It is their business to expend the money which we appropriate for them, and not tell us in the middle of a year that they have organized a service which is going to be demoralized if we cease giving more money. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MANN. No; I am not mistaken, because I know what this is. I have talked with these gentlemen.

Mr. SISSON. Now, the authority under which they did this work, however, was an item for the purpose of investigating the diseases of man, and this was the method under which they did that work. Now, in the expenditure of that money for the investigation of the diseases of man that fund became exhausted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. They knew whether it would become exhausted or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They wanted to do more than they can do under the appropriation.

Mr. MANN. I have talked with the Public Health Service, which has been carrying on this work. I have no doubt it has been done well and that it is a valuable work. They have made sanitation surveys of a number of the counties throughout the United States—some in West Virginia, some in Kentucky, as I now recall, and some in other States. If this appropriation should become available, I am informed by the State health officers in the State of Illinois that a county in Illinois would receive this health survey. I will be very glad to have it made, but I think the departments of the Government, knowing what money they have to expend, even when they find that it is a good work, ought only to expend the money that we appropriate for them. If we want to appropriate a larger amount next year, very well. We can not appropriate enough to have a health survey in every county in the United States. That is an impossibility. The counties that get it get a special favor. While we do some of that, $100,000 will not do all. Let them live within their means. If the Public Health Service wants to develop its possibilities, it ought to lay its case before the Committee on Appropriations and abide by their judgment, and not seek to get Congress to appropriate money to which they are not lawfully entitled.

Mr. SISSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, if this item goes into this deficiency bill they become lawfully entitled to it, and if it were not for the point of order I do not believe that the committee would vote this item down. I may be entirely mistaken about it, but I do believe that this work appeals to every Member of Congress in the House, because if there is one thing that the Agricultural Department or the Medical Department can do in reference to animals and food, for the purpose of preserving them, then the Government can preserve those people for whom these very departments exist; and if this service is proper service, we ought not to permit work of this kind to suffer solely because it happpens to be that a point of order can be made against it. I have no censure against these gentlemen who make the points of order. I believe in orderly legislation, but in deficiency bills there is usually a great deal of disorder. A great deal of it may be occasioned by the disorder in the departments, but it has been the custom of Congress for years to pass these deficiency bills, and if in this bill at this time this money can be provided so that now in the winter and spring months, when the disease is most easily arrested and the work can be most easily done, when the sanitation can be done at the earliest possible moment for the purpose of preventing the spread of the disease, then, indeed, this item ought to be included in this deficiency bill at this time until Congress can make provision for whatever activities they feel the Federal Government ought to enter into in reference to the preservation of the health of the country.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would not say a word more except that the gentleman says there are so many items in the deficiency bills which have no warrant of law. The gentleman must know that that is an extravagant statement. Nearly every item in this deficiency bill is an item where there is warrant of law and requirement of law that departments do something and there is not enough money to carry on the work that Congress has directed them to do. If that were the case here it would be perfectly proper to make a deficiency appropriation. One item of the bill where that rule does not apply is the citrus case, and that was a case of emergency. Now, in this case there is no emergency, no requirement of law. There is no special reason for making a deficiency appropriation except that the gentlemen think the work is a good thing. Well, it is no more valuable now than it would have been 10 years ago; it is no more valuable now than it will be 10 years hence, so far as that is concerned. It is valuable work that ought to be carried along progressively, a part at a time. It is impossible to do it all at once, and the Bureau of Health had no business to make a deficiency estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he is very much in sympathy with the purposes of the amendment, but there being no authority of law for this appropriation, he is forced to sustain the point of order.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of costs assessed by the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York in the case of Ali Geglow and another against Byron H. Uhl, as acting commissioner of immigration at the port of New York, $126.40.

The Secretary of Labor is authorized to charge against the appropriation "Expenses of regulating immigration" for the fiscal year 1915 not exceeding $15,000 for articles purchased for use during that period pursuant to orders placed during the preceding fiscal year.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] what that first paragraph means, and also the second, on page 27, line 19.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was a case in which a writ of habeas corpus was sued out to obtain the discharge of an immigrant who was detained at Ellis Island. The matter was carried up to the United States Supreme Court and the writ was sustained. The costs, amounting to $126, were entered in the judgment against the individual who happened to be acting as Commissioner of Immigration. The writ so issued to the commissioner was really against the United States. The custom is for the United States Government to pay the costs in legal proceedings of this character, instead of letting them lie against the official of the Government for the performance of his official duties.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay, etc., of the Army, $119,833.89.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 32, in line 24, after the sum of "$119,833.89," insert the following:

"Provided, That the limitations on the time for filing claims for arrears of pay, bounty, or other allowances growing out of the service of Volunteers who served in the Army of the United States during the Civil War or the War with Spain are repealed: Provided further, That hereafter no agent or attorney shall demand or accept for his services in connection with the prosecution of claims for arrears of pay, bounty, or other allowances due on account of the service during the war with Spain of an officer or enlisted man of the Regular or Volunteer Armies of the United States filed after the passage of this act any fee for any service rendered in connection therewith. Whoever shall violate this provision upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $500 or imprisonment for a period not exceeding six months, or both, and shall be disbarred from practice before the Treasury Department."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves a point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, by a provision of the act of December 22, 1911, on an urgent deficiency bill—and this is an urgent deficiency bill—there was legislation that placed a limitation as to the filing and adjudication of claims for back pay and bounty for soldiers of the Union in the Civil War after December 31, 1912. It was also provided that no agent should receive compensation for acting as such on claims filed after December 22, 1911, and a severe penalty was provided as against agents who violated the provisions of that act.

There were 2,200,000 men enlisted in the Union Army before the Civil War ceased. Prior to the act of 1911 agents and attorneys, procuring lists of soldiers, sent to soldiers circulars advising them that they had claims for back pay or bounty, or both, and soliciting employment, exacting frequently from one-fourth to one-half of the amount that they alleged to be due, and frequently demanding an advance of $1 or more to pay postage and expenses of correspondence. These circulars brought a great amount of business to the agents soliciting employment, and in the aggregate a large amount of money was advanced to cover postage and expenses of correspondence. In many instances, perhaps a majority, there was nothing due to the soldier.

The act of 1911 cut off all such petty graft, and rendered unlawful the employment of agents in the premises. Such employment was never necessary; but in my judgment the limitation that was placed upon the filing and adjudication of claims by soldiers should not have been enacted, and I believe that act of limitation should be removed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Did I understand the gentleman to say that there is still some money due the veterans of the Civil War that they were unable to obtain by reason of this bar of the statute of limitations?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; for back pay and bounty. I have investigated two cases myself. There are possibly many thousands of just claims barred by this limitation. The gentleman must recollect that there were 2,200,000 men who were under pay, and a good many of them, perhaps the larger portion of them, were entitled to bounty as well. Most of them have been paid. I apprehend the amount will not be very large that is unpaid, but after waiting for the money, they ought not to be denied that which was due them for their service for the perpetuation of the Union.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I entirely agree with the gentleman, and if I understand the purpose of his amendment it is, first, to remove the bar of the statute of limitations created by the act now in force, and, second, to prevent the claims agents from absorbing most of the amounts.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; the act of December 22, 1911, as to soldiers of the Civil War contains that penalty, so that it is not necessary to reenact the same; but the latter part of the amendment removes the bar as to soldiers of the War with Spain and puts in a proviso "hereafter," and so forth. I apprehend we could not say "heretofore," because that might be interfering with the freedom of contract; but we can do it as to the hereafter, and we have done it in pension legislation time and again—limiting the fees.

I hope the gentleman from New York will not make a point of order. This amendment has been prepared with some care, after examination, and inasmuch as the legislation went upon the urgent deficiency bill in 1911, from the moral and equitable standpoint it seems to me it might be amended upon this urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the legislation referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was incorporated in an urgent deficiency bill in December, 1911, as the result of statements made by the Auditor for the War Department, from which it appeared that very gross abuses were connected with the presentation and prosecution of these claims. If I recall what was stated at the time, it then appeared that practically none of the men who took part in the Civil War were presenting these claims, but their heirs were being drummed up by claim agents and exorbitant fees were being taken for the prosecution of the claims, when the only thing necessary was to write a letter to the Auditor for the War Department making the claim, and the amount due was computed by the auditor from the records in the department and certified for payment.

Congress determined to give an additional year in which these claims might be filed, and then to bar them. That gave 50 years from the time the claims accrued in which they might be presented against the United States Government. There may be some few cases where survivors of the war have ascertained that they have these claims and desire to present them. Personally I would have no objection to legislation by which these men might be taken care of, but I can not consent to repeal in this way and wipe out this bar and to start up the old practices. Regardless of the penalties, the men who make a specialty of presenting claims of this character will find some way to evade the statute. They are men who have had the heartlessness to take 50 per cent of these claims simply for writing a letter to the Auditor for the War Department. While these claims aggregate very enormous sums, they are for very small individual amounts in the very great majority of cases, and in no instances are they for very large sums. I can not consent, as the gentleman well knows, to a provision repealing this law at this time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I fancy the gentleman will pardon me a little further. No claim agent or attorney could get one cent under this amendment, after the act of 1911, because by that act this kind of graft was cut out by the roots. This amendment leaves the law of 1911 still in force. It merely repeals the limitation contained in that act as to the time in which claims may be presented. The gentleman must recollect that there are from 400,000 to 500,000 of these soldiers still living.

I know about it, because in my own city there is a soldiers' home, and there are from 2,000 to 3,000 soldiers of the Civil War in that home. I have come in contact with them. I have made investigations in two cases. I suppose there are hundreds, and perhaps thousands, who are shut out by the legislation of 1911, by which legislation the Treasury is protected, as it ought to be protected, with a severe penalty against any agent or attorney who would prosecute such a claim. So there is no danger from that standpoint, and it does seem to me that if it is proper to waive the point of order to permit an appropriation of $300,000 to fight the citrus canker, it is proper to waive the point of order in favor of these men who fought to preserve the Union; and I think my friend will hesitate before making that point of order, especially as this legislation went upon the urgent deficiency bill in 1911 and was passed as we are now passing this urgent deficiency bill through the House. It seems to me, in equity and fairness, that as this limitation can be lifted safely it ought to be lifted, or at least that the House should have an opportunity to express its will. [Applause.] I hope my friend will not make the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this legislation to which the gentleman refers was incorporated in an urgent deficiency bill and it passed this House by unanimous consent.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It passed because of information as to the very gross abuses that were existing. There has been no complaint about that law.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Members of Congress have not found that it has been working an injuctice to the old soldiers. The gentleman from Illinois, with four or five thousand old soldiers in a home in his district, found two cases where he believed that an injustice has been done. Now, it may be possible to frame a provision on one of these other bills that will prevent any injustice being done to the old soldiers. No one wishes to do them an injustice, but I shall not consent to wipe out the statute of limitations and permit this money to go to persons other than the men who served in the Civil War.

Mr. CANNON. It does not permit it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It can; and under the law, if this be repealed, the most distant heir of a man who served in the Civil War could go and dig up these claims, as they have been digging them up, instigated by these claim agents.

Mr. CANNON. Not since the act of 1911.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; but the gentleman desires to repeal that act.

Mr. CANNON. I do not. I let the act stand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CANNON. I have the act here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This provides that the limitation on the time for filing claims is repealed. It is very apparent that this is no way to attempt to legislate. When these provisions are incorporated in these bills and pass the House by unanimous consent, it is the result of very careful investigation and consideration and preparation by a committee, where every phase of the matter can be considered carefully. I shall not consent, because under the obligations imposed upon me in charge of this bill I can not consent to legislation of such a sweeping character, and I insist on the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to the gentleman in the greatest kindness that he grows vigilant where an honest debt is due.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I insist on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I do not propose to let the gentleman make such remarks as that about me. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it is almost impossible to get consideration from the committee that has jurisdiction touching this matter or from the House, with 30,000 or 40,000 bills soon to be pending, and with great numbers of public bills to take up the attention of the House. I can not make any further appeal to the gentleman. And I will not make any threats. On this very bill we have appropriated $300,000 to combat the citrus canker; and because of the great necessity for it, no point of order was made against it. I will not make any threats that I will make points of order, but I think the gentlemen might well have allowed the House an opportunity to vote upon that amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded with and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARRISON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for an indefinite leave of absence for my colleague Mr. STEAGALL, on account of sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for his colleague on account of sickness in his family. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RURAL POST ROADS.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7617) to provide that the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall, in certain cases, aid the States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

Pending that I want to see if we can arrive at some agreement as to how long general debate shall run. Has the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN] any suggestion to make?

Mr. DUNN. I think that we on this side would be satisfied with eight hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri and the other half by myself.

Mr. MANN. Make it 10 hours.

Mr. DUNN. I will suggest 10 hours.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to agree to that length of debate, but if there are so many people who desire to speak I suppose we might as well accept it, one half of the time to be controlled by the chairman of the committee and the other half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN].

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 10 hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN]. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, which I do not know that I will do, I will suggest to my friend from Missouri that if he expects to pass this bill and to do anything for good roads, it looks as if we ought to get through pretty soon, because there is other legislation coming up, and it seems to me that the debate ought to close by to-morrow night.

Mr. MANN. When this bill was given a privileged status, it was stated—and that was the understanding—that there would be liberal general debate allowed on it in view of the fact that there was nothing else coming before the House upon which much general debate could be had at this time. I am in favor of disposing of this bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we ought to pass it as early as possible.

Mr. MANN. I do not think a day or two will make any difference.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] object?

Mr. FOSTER. I did not.

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether he can allow me some time out of his time?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I presume that the gentleman from Missouri will be allowed time. I assured him privately that I would grant him time, but if he wants a public declaration, in order to bind me, I have no objection to giving him that security. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. RUCKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7617, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7617) to provide that the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall, in certain cases, aid the States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the road question, as far as Federal aid is concerned, first came before the House while the Post Office bill was being considered on the 22d of April, 1912. The gentleman from Missouri, now chairman of the Roads Committee of the House [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], introduced an amendment to the appropriation bill for the conduct of the Post Office Department, providing for an appropriation of $25,000,000, to be used at the rate of $15, $20, and $30 per mile for the improvement, repair, and maintenance of roads over which the rural mail was delivered.

At that time the record showed that the United States was losing $28,000,000 a year on the delivery of rural mail. The addition of this $25,000,000 proposed as an amendment to the bill would make the loss $53,000,000. I was opposed to the adoption of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, and I believe I made a speech against the proposition at that time. Later on the House agreed to the adoption of the amendment, and the appropriation bill for the Post Office Department that year carried this item.

When the bill went to the Senate the Senate disagreed to the item and suggested the appointment of a commission to study the question of Federal cooperation with the State in the matter of constructing roads. The commission, as a result of the Senate suggestion, was appointed, and I had the honor of having a place on that commission. The commission served for about two years, during which time it made an exhaustive study of road building throughout the world. It finally reached the conclusion that it would be wise for the Federal Government to cooperate with the States.

The report of the commission was made to the House and to the Senate. The House adopted a new rule providing for the appointment of a Committee on Roads, of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] was made chairman. That committee reported another bill last year, in which it provided that roads should be classified, running all the way down from macadam, a high-class road, to roads that were made of ordinary dirt worked over by a scraper or drag. This bill provided that $25,000,000 should be authorized to be expended out of the Federal Treasury in cooperation with the States. The bill, however, was drawn in such a way that if it had become a law the States of the Union would be able to draw the money allotted to them out of the Treasury of the United States without being obliged to use one dollar of the money allotted to the State for the purpose of building roads. The Senate did not agree to this bill.

To-day we have before us a new bill recommending an appropriation of $25,000,000 to be distributed to the States.

I have not been an enthusiastic advocate of Federal cooperation with the States in road building. Indeed, before I become a member of the commission which made this comprehensive study of the question, I was really opposed to Federal cooperation. But after having gone carefully into the question, I reached the conclusion that if the country was to have the kind of roads to which it is entitled, the Federal Government must cooperate in some way, and so I have evoluted with the times, and to-day I am a believer in the wisdom of Federal cooperation in road building. I do not, however, agree that the bill reported by this committee is a wise bill, not that I have any criticism of the committee for reporting the bill in the form in which it is, for I believe that every member of this committee is patriotic and has done the very best that could be done under all of the circumstances. No bill reported by any committee of this House will ever be perfect. I say that not only of bills that refer to Federal cooperation in road building but to bills referring to any governmental activity. So when we legislate upon this question, as upon all other questions, we will find ourselves compelled in some way to compromise our views and take the situation as we find it.

This bill proposes to authorize the expenditure of $25,000,000, and it provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall be given the power to say whether he will pay 30 per cent, 40 per cent, or 50 per cent of the cost of the road to the State. I do not agree that the Secretary of Agriculture ought to have this discretionary power. What I fear is that, with this discretion placed in the Secretary of Agriculture, no matter how high-minded he may be, he will be influenced by people either in the House or in the Senate, or outside of the House or outside of the Senate, to do the things which he ought not to do. I believe that any legislation enacted for Federal cooperation with the States in building roads ought to be so guarded as to prevent the possibility of political scandal or pork-barrel manipulation, if you please.

The time has come when I believe the Government should cooperate with the States, and to that part of the bill providing that the States shall have the right to initiate the improvements I heartily agree, but I believe that the bill should be so drawn as to reserve to the Congress, the law-making body, whatever discretionary power shall be placed anywhere. Why should we say to the Secretary of Agriculture that we authorize him to use his discretion as to what part of this money shall be used upon any kind of road within the boundaries of any State? What we ought to do is to enact a law that will give to every State automatically, as its right, whatever contribution the Government of the United States pleases to make to road building within the State. What I mean by that is, that when we apportion a given amount to the various States of the Union, whatever amount may be apportioned to a given State should be placed to the credit of that State upon the books of the Treasury Department, and when that State itself has complied with the terms required by the law, the Secretary of the Treasury then automatically must as a matter of law pay to the State the amount so accredited. No State should receive any compensation out of the Treasury of the United States toward the the building of its roads until the State itself has expended at least double the amount placed to its credit on the books of the Treasury of the United States. We ought to so safeguard the expenditure of this Government money that no President of the United States, no Senator of the United States, no, not all of the Senators of the United States nor all of the Members of the House combined, should have influence enough to induce the Secretary of Agriculture, or whoever may be placed in charge, to grant any favor to one State and not accord it to every State; that when the States earn the right to the money it shall go to the States, regardless of what the Secretary of Agriculture, the President of the United States, the Senate of the United States, or the House of Representatives may say about it. Why do I say this? We are starting out on a great work. There are 2,300,000 miles of highways in America, and over 1,200,000 miles of those highways the rural mail is carried to-day. The time will come when every mile of these highways will be improved. The law should be so written that when we embark upon this enormous enterprise we will feel certain and the American people will be satisfied that there can be no political scandal as the result of governmental cooperation with the States.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has the gentleman any doubt about the constitutionality of this bill as drawn?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, not being a lawyer, of course I do not enter into the constitutional questions involved, but I am assuming those who are lawyers have decided that question in the affirmative. Whether we have constitutional authority or not, the time was, away back in 1800, when the returns from the sale of public lands were contributed to the construction of public roads within the States in which the land was sold, and so I assume that if we had the right to do that then we have the right to do it now. But whether we have the constitutional right or not, it seems to me that the time has come when the interests of the public everywhere are best served by united action between the Federal Government and the State government. However, we must not lose sight of the fact that this law, if enacted, will leave it within the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to say who shall and who shall not be favored, who shall receive 30 per cent, who shall receive 40 per cent, and who 50 per cent of the money, and that can only be determined as the result of influence that may be brought to bear upon him. I want this law to be so guarded that no man in public life may be able to go to his district and say, "I am influential with the Secretary of Agriculture and I can bring to this district more money than my opponent in this campaign."

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask my colleague on what basis he would apportion the funds?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am not complaining about the apportionment. I am not saying whether the apportionment is correct or not. I am simply talking about the method that should be employed after the apportionment is made, the means by which the apportionment, when made, shall go into the treasuries of the States.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. If I understand my colleague, he would apportion according to the population, according to the number of miles in each State. Is not that the provision of the bill now?

Mr. MADDEN. There are three factors in this bill. One factor first gives $65,000 to each State because it is a State; the second factor is the number of miles of road, and the third factor is the population. The three combined make the basis of apportionment as recommended by the committee.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Now, my colleague would not permit the discretion to be vested in the Secretary of Agriculture, as I understand, but would have the money distributed or go to the credit of each State——

Mr. MADDEN. I would.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. To be paid out automatically.

Mr. MADDEN. Whatever the basis of apportionment may be I do not undertake to say, because I have not gone into that sufficiently thoroughly to justify my giving an opinion upon it, but once agreed upon, a basis of apportionment—and we know there is a certain amount of money coming out of the Government appropriations to a given State—that money should go to the State regardless of what the Secretary of Agriculture may say about it, and he ought not to be given the discretion to say whether 30 per cent of the cost of a given road or 40 per cent of the cost of a given road or 50 per cent of the cost of a given road shall be the proportion that he will pay.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the gentleman think that the method adopted in the bill last year, which passed the House last year, is a better method of dealing with the matter than the one provided by this bill?

Mr. MADDEN. I am frank to say I do not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why?

Mr. MADDEN. Under that bill there was no requirement whatever for the State that got the money to use it for building roads. It could put the money into its own treasury and pay any kind of obligation in the world with it that it wanted to pay. It need not use the money at all, and the only penalty for failing to use the money in the construction of roads was that it could not get the next annual apportionment, and of course that would be outrageous, unjustifiable. But this discretion left in the Secretary of Agriculture is not justifiable at all. There is another provision in this bill which authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to pay installments on the roads under construction by the State, but the authority which we grant does not require him to investigate whether the road has really been built upon which he pays the installment; and of course that is not good business. It is not wise, it is not just, and it leads to danger.

The main objection I have to this bill is that it opens the door to political scandal; not to-day perhaps, not to-morrow, maybe not a year from now or 10 years from now; but we are entering upon a system of expenditures which will grow year by year. To-day we propose an expenditure of $25,000,000. Now, every man here knows that $25,000,000 will not help to build many roads in all the States. You can not build a macadam road for less than $10,000 a mile, and a State that gets $300,000 or $150,000 out of this appropriation will not be able to build many roads; but if we prove that we are entitled to the confidence of the American people by the manner in which we safeguard the expenditure of this money the sentiment of the people everywhere, from coast to coast and from the Lakes to the Gulf, will be in favor of increasing Federal cooperation as time goes by and we will be spending for Federal cooperation not $25,000,000 a year but $250,000,000 a year; and I know of no money that can be as well expended, that will yield as good results as the expenditure of money for the construction of roads, for it will bring to the people who live in the rural districts of the country more happiness and greater prosperity than they have ever enjoyed before. [Applause.] There are 60 per cent of the people, however, in America who do not live in the rural districts.

This bill provides that all cities of 2,000 population and under may become beneficiaries of the expenditures under this bill, but all people living in cities of 2,000 or over are excluded from its privileges. Sixty per cent of the American people live in cities having a population of over 2,000 people, so that this bill, although it will tax the whole 100,000,000 of people, will have benefited directly but 40,000,000 of the 100,000,000. We men who come from great cities do not complain at this, for we realize that the time is coming when we ought to discourage the centralization of population in the great cities of America and ought to do everything in our power that is just, right, and reasonable to encourage people to go back to the farms [applause], where the life of the citizenship is healthful and where a greater degree of patriotism may be fostered and preserved. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true that a large per cent of the people in the cities will either be benefited or will use these highways when constructed?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes; I am not complaining, and have not complained; and nothing I have said will justify any complaint on the part of any man, that I object to my contribution as a city resident for the development of the agricultural regions of the country, for I believe that the country is the safety valve of America; that there is the population upon which we must depend in time of stress, and I want to encourage every boy and girl of the coming generations to realize that on the farm, in the country, where God's sunshine prevails, and where men and women may grow to maturity without surrounding influences that are a detriment to American institutions—that there is the place we ought to spend our money for the development of that patriotism upon which we must depend in the years that are to come for the maintenance of our great institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN rose.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska, if he wishes to interrupt me.

Mr. SLOAN. In the gentleman's construction of this bill I understood him to say that cities of over 2,000 inhabitants were excluded from the benefits of this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLOAN. Perhaps I do not understand it correctly——

Mr. MADDEN. Up to 2,000 they have the privileges; above 2,000 they have not.

Mr. SLOAN. The bill says that rural post roads—shall be held to mean any public road over which rural mail is, or might be, carried outside of incorporated cities, towns, and boroughs having a population exceeding 2,000, and in such cities, towns, and boroughs having a population exceeding 2,000 along streets and roads where the houses average more than 200 feet apart.

Which would be about 25 to the mile.

Now, then, is there anything in the statute that would prevent every dollar of the Illinois appropriation being used in approving or building post roads within the city of Chicago, beginning at its outside limit and running toward its center, if, in his discretion, the Secretary of Agriculture will say, "We will build up roads in the suburban portion of the city of Chicago and in that region where the residences are on an average of 200 feet apart"?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, you could not use a dollar of this money in a city of more than 2,000 people—not one dollar.

Mr. SLOAN. That is for construction by the House.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no question about it, absolutely. No dollar of this money could be used in any city for any improvement of any kind, on a post road or otherwise, of over 2,000 inhabitants, no matter whether the houses were 200 feet apart or 1,000 feet apart. But we are not complaining about that.

We people who come from the densely populated sections of America, as I have said, are willing to cooperate with all the other sections of America, because we believe we are doing the thing that is best for the people of America as a whole, and while we are not to be beneficiaries of this legislation, there is other legislation frequently enacted by the Congress that we do benefit from, whereas other sections of the United States do not benefit from them. So that in the long run the harbors of the great cities, the great buildings in the great cities, get their share of the public money for the development and maintenance of the public business, and we want every section of the Nation to feel that we are sufficiently patriotic to cooperate with them on any legislation that is bound in the long run to help America.

There is a feeling among the people all over the United States to-day that road building is the first and most important public activity in which the Government could be engaged. We are talking to-day a good deal about preparedness. But to be prepared to defend America's rights we must be able to move troops if we have them, and must have roads over which to move them. We are not going to be able to build these roads to-day and we are not going to require any troops to-day. And I hope that the day will never come when we will need to move troops to defend America's rights; but I do believe if the day ever comes we ought to be ready, and for one I am willing to do everything within my power to make every preparation to make us ready to defend our rights if they need to be defended [applause], whether it is by building good roads, buying harness, buying mules, cultivating fields; whether it is building large guns or defending the coast line, building battleships, maintaining armies, or any other thing that patriotic America believes ought to be done, not only to maintain America's present prestige but to be able to stand before the world with notice to everybody everywhere that we are not only ready now, but we will be ready always to defend America's institutions and hand down this Government unsullied to the generations that are to people this continent in the ages to come. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask at this time leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I appreciate this privilege and opportunity to address you upon the subject of Federal aid to good roads. I approach it modestly, not with the expectation of particularly enlarging your knowledge but with the hope that I may at least recall some things you have heretofore heard and emphasize some thoughts which may have been distinctly your own. The problem now before us is not a new one. It antedates many centuries, and has descended to us a heritage of ancient philosophy rather than a principle of recent deduction. It first appeared in our country as soon as affairs had adjusted themselves after the securing of our independence, and from 1802 until the present time nearly every Congress has had before it some phase of this subject, and during that entire period we have had a semblance of Federal aid to highway construction.

I was very much interested in and thoroughly enjoyed the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who presented opposition views to the passage of this measure. It seemed to me that his grounds were ill founded, and in the presentation of his opposition he very aptly illustrated his theory that under the provision of this bill roads would start from nowhere and go elsewhere. He deprecates the fact that some of the States will not be able to come within the purview of its provisions. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that his statement is without foundation and that in truth every State may enjoy the privilege of this bill without the trouble, the legal complications, and constitutional objections prevalent in bills upon the same subject heretofore presented to Congress. I do not think any bill has ever been presented which so completely covers the problem as does this. The gentleman from Massachusetts opposes the measure before us primarily, as he says, because in his State and in many of the Eastern States they already have completed their road systems. The gentleman is ill informed not only as to the other States but even with regard to his own State. Road systems are never completed, sir, in any sense of the word. I will concede that some of your Eastern States have made an excellent start and laid a splendid foundation, but only the gentleman's satisfied imagination supports his contention. Right to-day, upon the statute books of your State, there is a provision which requires all the revenues derived from automobile taxes, automobile licenses, and from fines, aggregating approximately $1,000,000 annually, to go into your good-roads fund. Only a year ago the gentleman's State legislature, under the provisions of law in his State, issued bonds to the amount of $2,000,000 for the good-roads system there. And so regardless of the modest enthusiasm of the gentleman concerning the roads in his State, there seem to be fair indications of opportunities still to improve the road system of Massachusetts. [Applause.]

The gentleman also insists that Federal aid in the construction of good roads is a plank in the Democratic platform and for that reason should not have the support of the Republicans on this side of the House. If the gentleman has discovered one plank in the Democratic platform which that party is endeavoring to fulfill, his efforts are not without value, but as an excuse for any opposition to this measure his statement is decidedly puerile. The truth of the matter is that this is not in any sense a party measure, neither is the bill an exclusive product of Democratic brains. The time has long passed when either side must accept or reject remedial legislation simply because it is fluently labeled with any party's appellation. [Applause.]

The magnitude and importance of the subject must fairly be conceded by its opponents. The Sixty-third Congress appointed a joint committee to consider the feasibility of Federal aid to good roads. That committee has made a most exhaustive and comprehensive report, which I trust will be read by everyone interested in this project. The personnel of the committee insures the authenticity and value of their statements. Permit me to read a few extracts from this report:

From an economic standpoint the problem of good roads is not surpassed in importance by any other subject now before the American people. Experience has demonstrated that past methods are inadequate to accomplish desired results and the demand for Federal aid has become general and insistent. Viewed from the standpoint of financial returns alone, if the American people borrowed $8,400,000,000 at 6 per cent interest and invested it in permanent road improvements they would come out more than even and also enjoy the personal, social, and educational advantages of the good roads. Although the burden of national participation in highway improvement would fall most heavily upon city residents, yet inhabitants of cities have been among the most active advocates of Federal participation in highway construction and maintenance. Public opinion is overwhelmingly in favor of Federal aid. Replies representing 100,000 individuals came from every State in the Union, and, since the requests for opinions were made without discrimination and the answers received were from all parts of the United States, the responses show, with reasonable accuracy, the consensus of public opinion on the subjects mentioned. Ninety-seven per cent of the replies received favored Federal aid and 3 per cent were against it.

One of the members of this joint committee was the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who just addressed you so ably in opposition to the passage of this bill. I must confess that having heretofore read the favorable report, signed by the gentleman himself, his remarks to-day were somewhat surprising to me. Of course, having been a Member of this Congress for only 50 days, I realize that I have not yet enjoyed all of the surprises which await me. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will my friend yield there for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman in a minute.

Mr. MADDEN. Did I not say that in my speech?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Yes; the gentleman interrupts me to ask if he did not say that in his speech. He did, and he ought properly to have added this: "I am in favor of aid to good roads, but I know of no man on earth, including myself, who is able to draft a bill which will meet with my approbation." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, will my friend yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Very gladly.

Mr. MADDEN. Did I say in my speech anything that was contrary to what the gentleman read?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. No.

Mr. MADDEN. That is part of my own report.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. That is true. But, Mr. Chairman, with all due deference to the gentleman, whose superior knowledge I grant, I contend that he is now very much in the position of the woman who wished to buy eggs; she knew little of their character, but remembered that good eggs when immersed in water either stayed on top or went to the bottom, but upon reaching the market place she had forgotten which. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. The objection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] seems to start with line 14 of page 4, which limits the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture as to the amount of aid given to any particular improvement which might, as the gentleman from Illinois says, lead to favoritism in the various States. Will my colleague state the reasons which led the committee to allow the Secretary of Agriculture that discretion?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I shall be glad to give the gentleman my judgment.

If we are to have Federal aid in the construction of our public highways there must be a comity between the several States and the Nation. In this bill the State is represented by the State highway department, if they have one, and by an appointee of the governor in the very few States who have not now a State highway department; the Government is represented by the Secretary of Agriculture. It appealed to the committee that the several State highway departments were best fitted and best able to represent the State, and that they were most responsive and subject to the will and wish of the people in the State. We deemed it inadvisable to make the present unit smaller than the State lest it might argumentatively be open to the pork-barrel criticism directed against former bills upon this same subject. In so far as the Nation is concerned the committee thought the Department of Agriculture was best equipped and fitted to care for the Government's interests. This is right along their line of work. The War Department now recommends, superintends, and accepts the improvements made under the Federal aid to the waterways. If this assignment is proper, and it has been in vogue these many years, certainly the Department of Agriculture could properly be charged with the discretion conferred under the terms of this bill.

In order to defraud the Government under the terms of this bill, it would be necessary for two things to exist concurrently. Those are a corrupt State highway department and a corrupt Secretary of Agriculture, and in that connection permit me to say that as long as departments in this, or any other Government, are supervised by human beings that possibility will always exist; but I am not yet ready to reject a good measure simply because under its provisions it allows the exercise of discretion on the part of State and Government officials. With the eyes of the entire country directed on one or two persons, I think it much easier to keep them honest and faithful than it would be if this discretion were delegated to a larger number of people. I can not conceive of any man being appointed Secretary of Agriculture by the President of the United States who would be so small, parsimonious, and unworthy of his honorable appointment as to evince favoritism in the disposition of the Federal aid funds. Under the terms of this bill, he could not give any part of a State's apportionment to another State; in fact, the worst he could do would be to allow one State its entire quota and disallow another State its entire quota; but, sir, the question now presents itself if that is not a wise provision. Some States will so demean themselves that they should properly receive their entire quota while other States may try to secure their share without having fulfilled their obligations under the terms of this measure; and if there was a mandatory instead of a discretionary provision herein contained, it would be more liable to abuse than is the present bill. If we concede to others the same honesty and integrity of purpose which we claim for ourselves, the workable flexibility of this bill becomes its greatest asset rather than a proof of its inefficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. This joint committee to which I referred obtained authentic information from all the foreign countries as to their road conditions over there. In that connection permit me to say that that report shows facts which are worthy of the consideration of every Member of this House, and I trust every Member will read it. It shows that every foreign country, with the exception of Russia, has anywhere from one and one-half to three and one-quarter times the road mileage per square mile than has the United States, yet we claim to be a government of the people, for the people, and by the people, while those foreign countries are simply overshadowing us in their accomplishments in so far as good roads are concerned. Why, gentlemen, I desire to call your attention to the fact that 300 years before Christ Appius Claudius built a road from Rome to Naples which is better to-day than the road from here to Annapolis or the road from here to Richmond; still we claim to be the most progressive of all nations.

During the past century this country has spent millions, yea billions, upon our public waterways. I do not deprecate that expenditure. In fact, I am in favor of it. Yet upon this floor only a few days ago a gentleman arose and said that at least one-half of that expenditure had been wasted. I rather doubt that statement; but even if it is true, what does it prove? It only proves that Congresses heretofore and this Congress and future Congresses, if they permit the waste, are at fault. It certainly does not by innuendo, inference, or otherwise prove the iniquity of the purpose.

Our attention is challenged to the fact that the Federal aid to the waterways is a contribution to a Government service over which the Government never loses control. That sounds well, but, analyzed, it means only this: In so far as the waterways are concerned the Government maintains the semblance of police authority for the enforcement of rules laid down by the Government, and they also establish protective stations to safeguard the lives and property upon this avenue of commerce. Nothing more can be claimed. I am glad that our waterways have had the care and attention of this Government; but in behalf of the 50,000,000 people who do not see or use the waterways I ask you why this Government should longer continue to discriminate as to our great highways of commerce. Until very recently the general road system of this country was a system of tolerance. It was one whose origin was almost legendary; one which we had copied from Great Britain, and to which we have tenaciously held, although it was discarded by our mother country over a century ago. We may differ on many phases of the Government's management, but in the effort to secure good roads we certainly can find a common ground free from party lines or political dissension.

A committee, whose membership represents the two great political parties of this country, have, with but a single dissenting voice, presented this bill for your favorable consideration. We do not contend that it is the best measure of accomplishment, but we do insist that it is a step in the right direction, based not upon fancy or idle theory but founded upon a system which, if properly followed and extended, must inevitably bring greater returns than any expenditure heretofore made by this Government. Ninety-seven per cent of all the people living within the confines of these United States favor Federal aid in the construction and maintenance of public highways.

The rural districts ought not to be compelled to do a work in which the whole people are in every way interested and in the reward wherefrom the rural resident is the lesser participant. In the bill before you we have made what we consider a fair apportionment of the funds. We have allowed the several State highway departments to continue their activities along their own particular lines, to which it must necessarily be conceded they are best advised, and certainly the magnificent highways of California, the Columbia River Road, and the beautiful highways in our Central and Eastern States must convince any doubtful hearer or student of the subject that the several States, under the terms of this bill, are well able to care for the task assigned. It is neither commendable nor logical for people who have enjoyed good roads these many years to oppose a plan which would make their enjoyment a possibility for our less fortunate citizens and countrymen. In ancient days the empire's resources were taxed to build great imperial highways, so that its armies might reach distant provinces to quell insurrections or collect tribute. To-day roads are not built for pillage or conquest, and we hope not for the needs of war, but these great highways are primarily constructed for civilization and trade. They are the avenues of uplift in our social, intellectual, and religious life. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I shall consume the time allotted to me in endeavoring to answer some of the criticisms leveled at this bill by my good friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. MANN. I do not want to impose on the gentleman from South Carolina, but I think I voted twice for a good roads bill in the House. I know I voted for one in the last Congress and I think I did in the one before that. The other two bills, I think, were alike. This bill is entirely different. Nobody has yet explained the difference or why the committee have changed their attitude. I hope that at some time somebody on the committee will do us the honor of telling us what caused the flop.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will answer the gentleman from Illinois. The fact is that the bill in the last Congress was not the same as the bill in the Sixty-second Congress. If my recollection is correct, the gentleman from Illinois voted against the amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill in the Sixty-second Congress, though I am not certain.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's recollection is not good.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I know the gentleman from Illinois in the last Congress voted for the bill and made a short speech in favor of it. That bill, however, was not the same as the bill in the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. MANN. Practically the same.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can explain the difference to the gentleman. In the Sixty-second Congress the proposition submitted as an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill was the proposed classification of the roads into A, B, and C, with a provision for the payment of a rental of so much per mile for class A, so much for class B, and so much for class C, provided it should be proved first that the State had during the preceding year spent a like amount on those roads.

In the Sixty-third Congress there was a bill introduced—I am familiar with it, because I introduced the bill—and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] likewise introduced a bill which was almost identical with the provisions of this bill. That bill was made section 2, and then the classification of roads—the rental proposition, as it was called by some—was made section 3, and there was another section giving to a State the alternative of electing under which section of that bill it would receive Federal aid. That was the bill in the last Congress.

As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] knows, both those bills met with strong opposition in the Senate. First proposed as an amendment to the Post Office bill, it was voted down, and finally we had an experimental appropriation of $500,000 added in conference. Then in the last Congress the bill passed this House, but was never even reported from the Senate committee. I know that it met with strong opposition in the Post Office Committee of the Senate, and there was no chance for its passage in the Senate.

This year the American Association of Highway Engineers met and appointed a committee to draft a bill providing for Federal aid. That bill is almost identical with the provisions of the bill now reported by the Roads Committee. When it was presented to the committee, we believed that it eliminated all of the features that had been objected to in the Senate, and in addition eliminated the feature that has met with the strongest opposition in this House, where it was charged that the proposition to pay a rental for the roads over which the rural carriers traveled would not demand of the States that the money be spent for the improvement of roads, and that there would not be that Federal supervision which is necessary to safeguard appropriations out of the Federal Treasury.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] was one of those who, with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], were particularly strong in their opposition to the classification road proposition. I heard the gentleman from Missouri say the other day that because that feature was eliminated he is now in favor of this bill. We were not so fortunate, however, with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], because, although he stated in the Sixty-third Congress that he was in favor of Federal aid and limited his opposition to that proposition providing for the rental, now, when we come to this Congress, he objects to a bill that is drawn in strict accord with the principles laid down by him in his speech, for he then said that he would favor Federal aid in cooperation with the States, provided that the States were required to spend the same amount before the Federal Government was called upon to spend anything.

The Association of Highway Engineers, composed of engineers from every State in the Union, are in favor of this bill. I may say to the gentleman from Illinois, too, that the Secretary of Agriculture is in favor of this proposition, and that the Director of the Office of Public Roads is in favor of this proposition, while both of them were opposed to the rental proposition that was in the last bill; and as we desired to report a bill that would stand some chance of becoming a law we eliminated the rental proposition. Having given it two trials we thought we were justified in making the change.

The rental proposition having been eliminated, the gentleman from Illinois now finds a new reason for opposing this bill. He says the Secretary of Agriculture is given too much discretion. He believes it would open the door for a Member of the House or of the Senate to influence the Secretary of Agriculture. If he really believes that, he would also object to the provision that before any amount is paid the Secretary of Agriculture should inspect the road to see whether it has been finished in accordance with the plans and specifications. He wishes us to believe that if a Member of the Senate or the House should go to the Secretary of Agriculture and say "It is true, Mr. Secretary, the road is not completed in accordance with the plans and specifications submitted and approved by you, but to please me I want you to approve of it and pay over this money," the Secretary would do it. If we are to believe that a member of the Cabinet, the Secretary of Agriculture, is going to use his office to please a Member of the House or the Senate and allow to a road a greater per cent than he should we may as well believe that under similar circumstances he would approve a road that does not come up to the specifications. We must place confidence in some official to administer the law, and I know of no reason why we should not assume that the Secretary will administer the law in the spirit in which it is framed.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman has covered the ground, but I am not sure. My recollection was that in the Sixty-second Congress we provided in the bill for the payment of $15, $20, or $30 a mile, which you call the rental proposition.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In the Sixty-third Congress we provided the same thing with an alternative about paying money to States. This bill leaves out the matter that was put in in the Sixty-second Congress entirely, or the particular methods we had in the Sixty-third Congress, and adopts to a large extent the alternative in the Sixty-third Congress.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is exactly right. The alternative proposition in the Sixty-third Congress is substantially the bill pending before the House. As a result of our experience in that Congress and of our more careful consideration we have thrown a number of safeguards around it and made it a much better bill than the alternative proposition in the last House.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] says that we ought to put double the amount which the States should pay. In several speeches during the last two Congresses he has never suggested that the States should be required to contribute twice the amount until to-day.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not mean that the State shall contribute twice the amount. I said the State should spend twice the amount placed to its credit before the Federal Government paid.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The criticism of the gentleman from Illinois was leveled at the discretionary power of the Secretary of Agriculture to contribute to any proposition from 30 to 50 per cent. I will tell the gentleman the reason the committee inserted that. In many States of the Union there is a considerable State road fund, while in some States the funds for road purposes are very limited. In the State of Illinois, for instance, you may have a road fund so large that you would rather have the Government contribute to the aid of a great number of roads with 30 per cent than to have it contribute to a few roads and pay 50 per cent. The gentleman overlooks the fact that no matter whether the Secretary of Agriculture allots the roads 30 per cent of the proposed cost or 50 per cent of the proposed cost, the State is entitled to its full quota under the bill.

If the Secretary of Agriculture says, in response to a given proposition, "I will allot you 30 per cent," it simply means that that State can receive aid on a greater number of roads than could a State which received from the Government 50 per cent. It was inserted because some wealthier States would prefer to have the Government contribute only 30 per cent to a great number of roads, whereas some States having only a few hundred thousand dollars to spend would prefer to have the Government contribute on a 50 per cent basis. But, in any event, whether it is 30 per cent or 50 per cent, the Secretary of Agriculture does not have the discretion or power to take away from the State the apportionment that it is entitled to under the basis of apportionment in this bill.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts, in his minority report, stated as to the basis of apportionment that if this is to aid the rural community the appropriation should be based on the ratio that the rural population bears to the population of the entire country. He does not believe that, I am satisfied. I think it was an oversight on his part when he inserted it in the minority report, because the provision in the bill which gives to a State credit for having within its borders a city with such a large population as Boston has results in the State of Massachusetts, from which the gentleman comes, getting a larger amount than it would receive if its quota was based merely on the rural population of the State of Massachusetts. But he answered his own argument when in his speech he took the position not that the State of Massachusetts is allotted too much but it is alloted too small an amount when you consider the amount of taxes that the State of Massachusetts contributes to the Federal Treasury. I think he stated that last year the States of Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio paid $31,140,000 of the total amount of the so-called war tax of $52,000,000. Of the States he enumerated I took the trouble to add up their allotment under this bill and I find they receive $8,363,750 by this bill; but that is no argument for or against the bill. The Congress can not adopt the policy of making no appropriation for any purpose in a State until it is ascertained that the proposed appropriation will not amount to more than the amount contributed by that State to the Federal Treasury. The gentleman would not favor applying that narrow policy to State appropriations. Suppose, for instance, the city of Boston, which city because of its wealth contributes in great measure to the taxable funds of Massachusetts, should say to the legislature of that State that public funds in proportion to the amount of taxes paid by the city should be spent in internal improvements in that city, the gentleman from Massachusetts, in behalf of his section of that State, would immediately complain.

It is too narrow a view. The people of the city of Boston know that their prosperity is dependent upon the country. Last summer I went to New Hampshire, and every time I attempted to cross the street in the little city of Bethlehem I was kept busy dodging automobiles bearing a license tag of Massachusetts. They do not contribute to maintaining the roads of New Hampshire, but New Hampshire, on the other hand, through its tourist hotels, does contribute to the prosperity of the city of Boston, because they buy all of their supplies there; and I am satisfied that if he would submit the proposition to the merchants of the city of Boston he would find that they were in favor of contributing toward building roads in New Hampshire and in all other sections, out of the National Treasury, in order that the country might be developed and thereby the city of Boston be developed. The road problem is no longer a local problem. The increased use of automobiles has resulted in the roads being used by persons residing in different counties and different States who do not contribute to their maintenance at all, and it is not fair to expect the entire cost of construction and maintenance to be borne by the adjoining landowner.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in like manner the gentleman complained that in New York State they had built their roads, that that State already had a magnificent system of roads. That is true. He said that, having completed those roads, they should not be called upon to contribute to the construction of roads in the West and in the South. But a few minutes thereafter I heard the gentleman ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] if it were not true that last year the State of New York expended $14,000,000 in the construction of roads. If he is correct, then it would appear that New York has not completed all of its construction work, and that a great part of that $14,000,000 expenditure last year could have been expended in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture through the Secretary, had this bill been a law. Another argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], which was agreed to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], is that this bill would result in discouraging road building on the part of the States. But there is absolutely no justification for such an argument, the bill specifically providing that no appropriation can be made by the Secretary of Agriculture until the work has been completed by the State in accordance with the plans and specifications approved by him, or in case of partial payment, that in no case shall a dollar be paid unless the State has already paid a like sum in that construction work, and in any event the discretion is always placed in the Secretary of Agriculture, and instead of making a partial payment he need not make any payment unless he is satisfied that that work is done in accordance with the plans and specifications approved by him.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Evidently a great deal of money will be necessary to pay the expenses in Washington and the expenses of men to go over the country to inspect these roads. Is any part of that expense to be paid out of the allotment to the State, or is it to be paid out of the amount to be retained by the Secretary for the expense of management?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, my recollection of the terms of the bill is that they provide that it shall be deducted out of the fund by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. What fund?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Out of the gross appropriation; out of the total fund.

Mr. MANN. Section 3 makes provision.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will read the gentleman the language of the bill:

> That as soon as may be after the passage of any act making appropriations under the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall prepare and file in his office a statement showing the amount of such appropriation he has set apart to defray the expense of his department in the administration of this act.

And he shall then certify to the States the amount of the balance available to each State.

Mr. SAUNDERS. And also in section 2 there is a provision that out of the general appropriation the Secretary reserves a fund sufficient to cover these expenses.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this is one bill that has never been discussed in a partisan manner in this House. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] the other day—I suppose for the purpose of influencing those on the Republican side of the House—said that the members of the Republican Party should not be anxious to assist the Democratic Party in redeeming one of its campaign pledges. The truth is that the Progressive Party in its platform unequivocally declared in favor of Federal aid, and the truth is that in the past not only has the leader of the Republicans, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] voted for this bill, but the great majority of Republicans on this bill have voted in favor of it, so that in no way can it be considered a partisan measure.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman have any idea that the Democrats in this Congress will carry out the pledge in their platform on this subject?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the belief of the gentleman is that the Democrats in this House will do it, but I would not undertake to speak for the Democrats in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. It would be so unusual for the Democrats to carry out any plank of their platform that I do not believe they will.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words about another objection that has been raised to this bill. I refer to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that this bill forces a State to establish a highway department, whether it desires to or not. It is true that this bill will force every State by 1920 to establish a highway department, but I do not think he ought to entertain any worry because of that provision, for his State has one. If there is anyone who ought to complain about that, it ought to be the gentlemen from Indiana, from Texas, from the State of Georgia, from the State of Mississippi, and from my own State of South Carolina, because those five States are the only States that have no highway departments. I must say that I do not complain, because from my study of the subject I know it would be practically impossible for the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with every county and township in the United States of America.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman states that he has no highway department in his State. Does not this bill provide that the State shall share in the benefits just as much as though it did have a highway department?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Only until 1920; and by 1920 they must have a highway department.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is paid by the Government to an official of the State government designated by the governor until 1920.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Until 1920.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If you do not want it by that time, send it up to Michigan.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Under the bill South Carolina is entitled to $415,000 a year, and there is no danger of our not placing ourselves in position to secure it. I want to say this provision has been made allowing them until 1920 so that in case the legislature of any one of these States shall not convene for one year or two years that they will have ample time within which to place the State in a position to participate in this fund. As far as my own State is concerned, whether or not this bill becomes a law, I think it will be to the best interests of the State to have a highway department; but, even if I am wrong, certainly it is true if we are to have any Federal aid we could not expect the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the various townships. In some of the States the road work is in the control of township commissioners, and there are 30,000 townships in the United States of America and over 3,500 counties. It will be impossible to open up a set of books and keep accounts with all of those counties and all of those townships. Why, the bookkeeping expense would amount to so much that very little of this fund would ever reach the roads where it is most needed.

Again, how would the Secretary of Agriculture decide in which county or which township the road would be built? His lack of knowledge of the local conditions would preclude his doing that in an intelligent manner, and therefore we say that Congress should treat with each State as a sovereign State and give to that State through its highway department the power to say where that money should be spent and to propose a specific proposition to the Secretary of Agriculture for his approval. The work can then be done under the laws of the State, and jurisdiction over the roads remains with the State.

If in the discharge of their duties under the bill the State highway department officials are arbitrary, the people of that State can remedy it by getting rid of those officials at the next election. I believe that the effect will be that each of the five States without a highway department now will establish one within the next few years and place themselves in a position to participate. Another reason why it would not be practicable is that in some States, South Carolina for instance, the work is done by counties. I know that is also true of Georgia, Mississippi, and, I think, Indiana, and very few counties are able to employ road engineers. This bill provides that a proposition submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture shall have surveys, plans, and specifications. No township or county without a road engineer could ever submit to the Secretary of Agriculture plans and specifications and surveys in such a manner as would receive his approval, so it will necessitate the appointment of a highway department, with the employment of engineers who can assist the county and local township officials in the preparation of propositions to be submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture.

I do not intend to discuss the value of good roads, because every sane man realizes their value. I have for years hoped that a bill providing Federal aid could be passed here. In the Sixty-second Congress I found that there were more than 20 bills on the subject introduced, and as up to that time no bill had been reported by a committee of the House I concluded that by individual effort nothing could be accomplished. I therefore invited every Member who had introduced a bill on the subject to meet at my office. Nearly every one attended a meeting at which, acting as chairman, I appointed a committee of which the chairman of the Roads Committee, Mr. SHACKLEFORD, was made chairman; and this subcommittee drafted a bill which was afterwards agreed upon by us and introduced, and later was considered in the House as an amendment to the Post Office bill. I realized then, as I do now, that no man can hope to secure the passage of a bill on this subject the provisions of which are exclusively the product of his brain. All legislation is enacted as a result of compromises, and while this bill may not be what I would have it, if given power to write a bill, I believe it is more likely to pass this Congress than any other measure, and at the same time its provisions insure, if it shall become law, that an advanced step will be taken toward securing the construction of permanent roads that will not be open to the charge of starting nowhere and running elsewhere.

I wish to express the hope that, disregarding the expressed desire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that this measure be considered as a partisan measure, the Republican Members of the House will join with the Democratic Members in placing upon the statute books this law, which will do more to promote the prosperity and the happiness of the people of the country as a whole than any other measure pending before this Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I was one of those who opposed the so-called good-roads bill in the Sixty-third Congress, and it would not serve any profitable purpose at this time to review the argument that I made at that time. It is sufficient to say that the present bill is, in my judgment, a very much better bill and a very much more practical bill than anything that has been presented to this House on the subject of Federal aid for roads. I have been a persistent advocate of Federal aid for good roads, and my advocacy has been on the ground not that the Federal Government was under any obligation to assume any portion of the activities or burdens or responsibilities now discharged by the local authorities in regard to roads, but rather to supplement and augment them and provide for a general improvement in all forms of roads.

I believe that is possible under the present bill and that an opening is made for Federal aid which will encourage the building of modern roads. I have no apology to make for having persistently advocated a higher type of road, the so-called permanent roads or modern roads, as against the mere expenditure of Federal money for the temporary upkeep of unimproved roads. I would not advocate a bill which would require or compel the expenditure of Federal money for the temporary upkeep of the ordinary unimproved roads. Such a bill, I believe, might be open to all the objections which have been urged against Federal road bills; that they would discourage local enterprise; that they would result in constantly increasing demands upon the Federal Treasury without an increasing response or cooperation by the States; and that they might not result in any distinct improvement in our present system of roads. The pending bill will permit, and I believe, encourage the building of modern highways. I am a believer in the principle of Federal aid and I listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who is on the Roads Committee, and to his objections to Federal aid. His argument was that some of the States of this Union have a very large taxing power and are able to and do provide themselves with a modern system of roads, and therefore all the States can do equally well. I congratulate the gentleman from Massachusetts upon the increasing wealth of his State. He has every reason to be proud of it. But I desire to remind the gentleman that all of that wealth which demands and receives the protection of the Federal Government was not originated or produced in the State of Massachusetts. It is the centralized wealth of the Nation. I know that objection from the same source was made to opening the western territory, even to the acquisition of the Louisiana Purchase at the very beginning of our national history, that it might in some degree discriminate against the older States, and yet the very reverse has been the case.

The older States have grown in wealth and population and culture and refinement as the newer States have come in and added their quota of the general prosperity of the Nation. I believe that the same result will follow from the development of roads throughout the country. I might say to the gentleman that under this bill, which gives the States the initiative and permits them to expend the money upon a system of roads or a particular trunk-line road or certain individual roads, I do not know whether my State will devote immediately or in the very near future any portion of the fund coming to it to the congressional district which I have the honor to represent, because it so chances we have in that congressional district more improved roads to-day than in any other district in the State of Missouri. We have in the single county of Jackson over 300 miles of macadamized and oiled roads. But I support the bill because it will aid in developing every part of Missouri. My objection to the bill in the last Congress was that it was based not upon the necessity for roads but upon the question of the accumulation of taxing power in the districts where the roads existed.

It will help the committee to understand my point of view to say that that lies at the base of my whole idea on the subject of Federal aid to roads. Very frequently the districts which have the greatest need for roads and where the improvement of roads would be the most productive of benefit to the entire State and country have the least local taxing power to perform the responsibility. When I began to study the subject of roads I had an idea that a good road could be built and maintained by the adjoining landowners at their own expense, as streets are now constructed in the cities, but when I came to analyze that proposition I found to my surprise that it did not apply to rural highways.

The reason was this: City property is valuable solely for the purpose of location or accessibility, and which has no limit of value if it be well located and have the modern improvements. A farm is valuable for its power of production. Other incidents enter in, but that is the main value. The wealth that is produced on the farm can not stay on the farm. Before it becomes wealth it finds its way into the great distributing centers of the country. But the minute it leaves the farm and finds its way into the great distributing centers of the country, it to that extent reduces the taxing power of the local district where the wealth was produced, and it never returns for the purposes of taxation to that local district. Yet we have the entire Nation basing its prosperity upon the prosperity of the farms, annually drawing from the farms the taxable wealth and concentrating it in the cities and great distributing centers, never returning that wealth to the farms and communities, and leaving upon those communities the entire burden and responsibility of keeping up the facilities which produce that wealth. For that reason we have been upon a false basis.

There has never been any one thing which has so militated against good roads in this country as the plan of isolated local control over roads. Our road district is the smallest political subdivision that we have, and that small political subdivision is supposed to take care to the best of its ability of the particular sections of roads that are in that political subdivision. The result is that some small divisions have magnificent roads; some States have magnificent roads, and other States, with large mileage and scattered population and immense needs for immediate development, have a burden which they are unable immediately to assume. This is true of the State of Missouri. Our business men recognize that the wealth that is now centered in Kansas City and St. Louis was not produced in Kansas City and St. Louis, but is a part of the accumulated wealth of the State of Missouri.

The wealth which is now centered in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore was not produced in those cities, but is a part of the centralized wealth of the entire American Nation. It demands the protection of the entire country on all Federal subjects, and it receives it. It demands it on the question of other transportation, rivers and harbors, and properly so, and there is no reason why it should not respond, on the same principle, when it comes to the improvement of rural roads, which are as much a vital part of our prosperity as the improvement of the rivers and harbors or any other part of our national activity. [Applause.]

If the transportation across the Alleghenies were severed for 30 days, New York and Boston, with all their boasted prosperity, would be on the verge of starvation. There would be no possibility of feeding the great population of those centers without the immediate facilities for transportation from the West.

It is the isolated system of local control of roads which has militated against a general improvement of the highways. We borrowed that system from England, as we did most of our common law, but we borrowed it at a time when England was a hermit nation, with her forests full of outlaws and 95 per cent of her young men going to the Continent for an education. We have adapted it to a country 3,000 miles in extent, under necessity for immediate development, with a sparsely settled population and at a time when England and every other nation of the world have abandoned a system of local, isolated control of roads. Every man knows who has given the subject any study that all of the other civilized countries of the world have a national system of roads, supplemented by provincial and local roads. I do not think the time is far distant when in this country, by the cooperation of the State and Nation, with the local authorities cooperating with the State, we will have a system of interstate highways as wide and as great in its ramifications as the present system of railroads, and as useful.

I know that we have had to weather a storm of abuse and considerable ridicule in advocating a system of high-grade, improved highways, and yet even the experience of two years since this bill was before the House has demonstrated the growing strength of that sentiment. There was formed a few days ago in a central Missouri city an association of permanent road associations. These road associations believe in through roads—a system of roads, permanent roads, all-the-year-around roads. The sentiment is growing in every State of the Union, and particularly in the State of Missouri. Every business man in every small town in the State of Missouri to-day, almost without exception, belongs to some road-improvement association designed to connect the roads of his town with the great centers of the State and with interstate traffic. The present sentiment in favor of good roads was largely created and is fostered by these road associations, who are working in the interest of high-grade interstate highways. Although I have been ridiculed and abused for supporting this business sentiment on the floor of Congress, I have no apology to make when I see Congress coming to our view. What the farmers and business men want is roads, not politics. As the business men have awakened to the need of a system of permanent roads, the ideas of Congress have changed to conform to the advancement of public opinion.

That is the present tendency of the times. To my mind it accounts for the great improvement in this legislation which we now have before the House to-day over that which was offered to us two years ago. We have not given all the attention to this subject that we could. We certainly did not know a great deal about it when we started in to legislate upon it. The public has also educated itself considerably on the subject, and we are getting nearer to a working system now than ever before.

We believe we ought not to confine our aid to local roads, and ought not to confine it to post roads, or confine it to mere rental of roads. We have the right under the construction of the Federal Constitution to provide for commercial roads, roads carrying interstate traffic.

When the building of the Panama Canal was proposed some gentleman brought a suit against Leslie M. Shaw, then Secretary of the Treasury, to restrain him from paying out any money for the construction of the canal, on the ground that the Constitution gave to Congress no power to construct such a canal; but Judge Brewer, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, said the Constitution was as clear in investing the Congress with the power to authorize the construction of a canal for interstate commerce as in the power to authorize the construction of a road, and that the latter proposition was now clearly settled in the jurisprudence of the United States.

What is interstate commerce? When does it begin and when does it end? We all recognize the fact that the free interchange of commodities is the greatest method of disseminating and diffusing wealth. The largest amount of interstate commerce begins its journey to the market on the rural roads; all of the supply of the food products of the country and much of the great raw material which enters into manufactures and forms the great bulk of our exports and turns the balance of trade in our favor begins its course to the markets on the rural roads. We believe that the great harbor of New York is an agency of interstate commerce. We know that when a ship sails out of that harbor carrying a cargo of American wheat abroad it is engaged in interstate commerce; but I believe that the minute the farmer turns on a public road with a load of wheat on its way to market, that wheat has as certainly entered the commerce of the world as when the ship clears the lights of Sandy Hook and starts on its way to Europe. We can not differentiate between them. That wheat is just as certainly on its way to the great commerce of the world when it started on the first road to the market town as when it started on its voyage across the ocean.

We must begin at the beginning, at the very base, to build up the prosperity of the country. But, in addition to the commercial argument, the social and intellectual conditions of the rural sections all invite at this time the serious attention of Congress to the subject of good roads. Not only does the taxable wealth leave the country districts but the working power of the community also leaves the country districts. What is it that has made farm life open to the charge of loneliness and isolation? That charge has been largely removed by the rural free delivery and the telephone and the daily delivery of mail. The next great step toward the socialization of farm life is the rural highway. [Applause.] The rural highway will build up the local church. It will build up the local school. It will build up the local town and trading point. It will turn the stream of life and travel and commercial wealth back into the country districts from which they originally came. It is the only tendency of modern life that will have that effect. All other tendencies of modern life have been to put a blight upon country life and small town life. The great railroads, the great department stores, the great mail-order houses, and all of the distribution of wealth and capital have tended to sap the life-blood of the smaller communities and leave them nothing upon which to build. But the good roads, enabling the farmer to haul his products 365 days in the year, enabling him to get to the market town, enabling him to go to the country church, enabling his children to get to school, enabling his neighbors and relatives to visit, to come in and sup with him, will bring back the social life to the community.

What is it that brings the young people trooping into the cities? What is it that they see or think they see under the bright lights of the cities? Is it the opportunity for the indulgence of vice? No man who knows the young people of the country believes any such statement. They see, or think they see, under the glittering bright lights of the cities the opportunities for social and intellectual stimulus which the young people need; in short, the things which these good roads, with the interchange of social life, will encourage. If the social opportunities and opportunities for intellectual advancement could be had in the rural communities, the young people would be content to stay on the farms and in the small towns, whereas they are now flocking to the cities. We are able to comprehend at this time the effect that a general system of good roads will have on the general social life of the community.

I know that in most of the States, and particularly in the Middle Western States, the cities and urban population have grown at the expense largely of the rural population. The rural population in many places has fallen off, while the city population has gained. We can talk all we choose about the back-to-the-farm movement and how independent the farmer is, but until we are willing to provide a general system of good roads by a general system of taxation, reaching all the wealth of the State and Nation, and giving an equal opportunity to the man who stays on the farm and in the small town with the man who goes to the city, we talk in vain. We must let him know that he is to have an equal opportunity for the development of his section with those in the cities, and in order to do that we must lay our hand upon the accumulated wealth of the Nation, whether it be on farms or in the cities, for objects like improved roads, which are for the general good of the whole community.

Now, it may be true that some portion of the taxes collected in one part of the country will be expended under this plan in another part. I have no doubt that a great deal of the tax collected in Kansas City and St. Louis is expended throughout the State of Missouri under the system of State taxation, and a great deal of the wealth of Massachusetts will be expended in the rural States from which that wealth originally came. Yet that will not prove a disadvantage to those great wealth-concentrating centers. Does that mean that there is an unequal distribution of the burdens of taxation and government? Not necessarily so, because if the business men of the cities are wise they will recognize, as I think my constituents do, that their wealth originally came from the country districts, and that the improvement of the country districts will indirectly improve the cities.

This principle is recognized universally by the States. The State of Missouri with its great cities of St. Louis and Kansas City, and the State of Illinois with its great city of Chicago, taxes the whole property of the State for the improvement of roads and for other general State purposes. The improvement of the roads of Missouri, Montana, and the Dakotas is just as much a charge on the accumulated wealth now centered in New York, Philadelphia, or any large city. There is no injustice done to any section of the country. The main question before the people is whether the benefit is general, whether it be national in its character, whether it is so widely diffused and comes so fully under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution as to be a proper subject of national legislation. I believe it does.

Nor have I any complaint in regard to the control to be exercised by the Secretary of Agriculture over the expenditure of this road money. As members of the committee have said, we must entrust this power somewhere, and we must proceed on the assumption that an officer clothed with power will exercise it with discretion and good faith. In addition I see this advantage. I know that men in the rural districts charged with the administration of road funds and road laws, however conscientious and earnest they may be, can not in many cases be skilled road engineers. For this reason the recent road legislation of Missouri extends the aid of the State highway department to the local road authorities.

The highway commission, upon the application of a road district, will send an engineer to provide a scientific plan of road construction and give advice as to the utilization of the best material for road improvement. Without that the rural-road official is often helpless; he must pursue the archaic methods of constructing roads, which, as we know, often resulted in no improvement of the road system.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like two minutes more.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. What is now being done under the modern legislation by State highway commissions is proposed to be done under this bill by the Federal road department, and will result in real road improvement. All of the scientific knowledge which has been gathered by the Office of Good Roads will become available for the people. The Secretary of Agriculture will be able to put at the service of the local road officials in the State the services of experts familiar with the construction of roads brought from different parts of the country; familiar with the quality of road material available in the different sections; familiar with the processes of drainage which is an important feature in roads; familar with all the details which reduce the cost of the roads and result in a more economical upkeep. I take it that the aid to be thus given will be of great benefit. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does not the commissioner of agriculture make a certificate to be joined in by the director of highways? Must not the director of highways join in a certificate before the Treasury is obliged to pay any of this amount?

Mr. BORLAND. I suppose the gentleman means the director of highways in the State. He has the opportunity of initiative himself. Any plan which he desires approved by the Federal Government he can present, and then the Federal Government can have an opportunity to approve of it, and if it does, he will get aid in carrying out the improvement, maintenance, and providing for the roads.

Good roads are the golden chain that binds the Nation together for prosperity or defense. They lighten the burden of transportation, reduce the cost of living, raise the value of farm lands, increase the national efficiency, provide for the common defense, build up the church and school, banish the isolation of rural life, and spread prosperity, intelligence, and social advantages throughout the length and breadth of the land. We are just entering upon an era of road improvement which will make our national wealth and strength available, and I am glad to have had a part in the formation of this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts the other day referred to the fact that there were some States that were favoring this bill that had been derelict in the duty they owed the public in road building. The State from which I come has not been slow in building public roads. The State of Indiana has more miles of improved roads than any other State in the Union. [Applause.] We are not content with the roads we have, we want more and better roads.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. GORDON. I will ask you the question I was going to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] when his time expired. Does the gentleman know of any precedent in national legislation for taking public money out of the Treasury of the United States and using it on township roads such as is proposed under this bill?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; there is ample precedent for the expenditure of public money for the improvement of public roads. The United States Government, for the purpose of encouraging the diffusion of agriculture and the knowledge pertaining to agriculture, is contributing to-day to every agricultural educational establishment in the United States a certain amount of money for every student that enters the agricultural department. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. But that is not roads. I am talking about township roads.

Mr. MANN. We are building roads now out of an appropriation of $500,000 made last year, in the Post Office bill, which the gentleman from Ohio and myself both voted for.

Mr. SLOAN. The Constitution of the United States expressly provides for the establishment of post roads throughout the United States.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But that is not the only precedent.

Mr. KELLEY. There is the Cumberland road.

Mr. GORDON. And that was built by an appropriation of public land.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The United States is likewise paying to every technical school in the United States where there is a military establishment as an incident thereto a certain amount of money for each student there engaged. But that is not the only precedent where the same principle is applied. Some of the States of the Union have seen fit, out of their generosity, to establish old soldiers' homes, where an old soldier and his wife may spend their last days together, and for the encouragement of that kind of philanthropy the United States Government contributes for every male in those institutions $100 per year. The General Government has no claim upon those institutions and has no claim upon these agricultural colleges except the general good that the general public receives. Nor has the United States any claim upon these young men who graduate from these institutions or receive their military education there except that in time of war it may have an educated yeomanry from whom it may draw in defense of the country.

The only objection I know of that can possibly come from the State of Indiana is because of the fact that we have some people there who believe that we should not be encumbered with a State highway commission. To my mind that is one of the best possible things that can result to the State of Indiana by reason of this legislation.

As I have stated, we have built in the last 25 years more roads than any other State in the Union, but we have built them in a sort of slipshod manner, without any system, and there should be a system. In order that the greatest and best results may be obtained from the money invested there should be some central system, some scheme whereby the roads are built according to a common plan. That, to my mind, is one of the great benefits that is to be derived from this system. We are not complaining because the State of Indiana will contribute more money than she gets back by reason of this legislation. We do not feel that we in the State of Indiana are independent any more than the people in our adjoining States to the west are independent of one another. We feel that we are dependent and interdependent, each one of us striving as best we can to assist the others. If this idea of isolation advanced by some gentlemen here in opposition to this bill were to obtain, what would become of our educational system in this country? Take, for example, the State of Indiana. The great centers of population there contribute by far the greater amount of money that goes into the educational fund of the State; but it all goes into one pot and it is divided among all the school children throughout the State, so that the child living in the remotest district has the same educational advantages as the child who lives in a congested center.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GORDON. You do not know of any law that takes money out of the United States Treasury, though, and contributes it to the States for the education of the youth of the States, do you?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Why, certainly I know of a law, and it is a most wholesome one. I referred to it a while ago. Money is contributed by the United States Government to every agricultural school in this country, so that this country may be a better one to live in, and so that the people of the United States may have diffused among them a greater amount of knowledge on the subject of agriculture and be able to use to better advantage the opportunities which they have.

Mr. GORDON. But the National Government has never contributed any money to support the common schools of the State, has it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It might do it. There is no reason why it should not.

Mr. GORDON. Of course it might.

Mr. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS. It gave public lands for the support of the common schools in the States.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It did; yes. For the purpose of supporting the common schools in this country she gave thousands and thousands of her broad acres. [Applause.] Is not that a contribution worth while? We want to encourage other States in the improvement of their highways. Take the great State of Illinois, for example, that lies to the west of us—disgraceful, so far as her lack of road improvement is concerned. It is a fact known to be true that gentlemen who live in the southern part of the State of Illinois will go across the Ohio River into Kentucky and go on east until they get to a point south of the Indiana line, and then go the whole length of the State of Indiana to the city of Chicago. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there is a road traversible leading through Indiana to Chicago on the Indiana side of the State line?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And if it were not for those roads on the Indiana State line, by automobile, nine months out of the year, the people in the southern part of the gentleman's State could not reach Chicago.

Mr. MANN. Well, if the gentleman has not been over the road I will forgive him, but if he has I am afraid he has forgotten something. I have been there a good many times, and a man takes his life in his hands if he travels over those roads in the northern part of Indiana in any way.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know of any reason at all why anybody in Indiana would want to go to Chicago on any kind of road? [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Perhaps that is an answer to the gentleman's question?

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman's statement is true, and also the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, is it not an additional reason why this bill ought to pass?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to represent a district in the extreme southern portion of the State of Illinois, and I bear witness that the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] is absolutely correct.

Mr. MANN. I think that is a strange statement to come from a gentleman from the great State of Illinois.

Mr. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS. It is true all over the State of Illinois.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, it was my good fortune to be present at the Dixie Highway Convention held in Chattanooga during the past summer, and it was one of the grandest conventions that I ever attended. One would have thought it was either the national Republican or Democratic convention, so great was the enthusiasm. The gentlemen who represented the State of Illinois urged that a line or a branch line be established through the State of Illinois for the reason, and for the sole reason, that they might be encouraged and their citizenship encouraged to better road building. I did not refer to this matter to make any invidious comparison or to cast any reflection upon the great State of Illinois, for it is one of the greatest States in the Union, and their farm lands are unsurpassed by those in any other State because of their richness, and because of that fact she ought to be ashamed that she has not better roads alongside of them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Has the gentleman ever been up in Michigan?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and there is room for improvement up there. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, they have good farm land up there.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; they have. So, I say, there is every reason why this bill should be enacted into law. I am happy in the thought that there will be no partisanship manifested here in consideration of the bill. Republicans have ever encouraged this character of improvement for the purpose of keeping the young men and the young women on the farms and away from the congested cities of the country. They encouraged and, if you please, made possible the first rural post route in these United States, and they did it for that purpose. Rural post routes had their preliminary trial under a Republican administration when Mr. Harrison was President of the United States. It was killed by the second Cleveland administration and permitted to slumber until the administration of McKinley, when it was revived, and it has gone on doing the work for which it was intended since that time; and I am sorry to say that it remains for this present administration to so revolutionize the Rural System of the country that they are depleting it, so far as its efficiency is concerned, and taking away from the farmer the benefit that it was intended he should receive by reason of it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman if I understood him to say that the only thing lacking in order to stimulate the people of his State to more activity in road improvement is a contribution on the part of the Federal Government of over $1,000,000, which his State would get under this bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No, sir; if the gentleman understood me to say that, he understood wrong; but I do say, sir——

Mr. WALSH. I so understood the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do say that we are not a hermit State. We are willing to make our roads good, that the pleasure of the Bostonese may be made the greater in going from Boston to the city of Chicago. There is not a day when weather is passable but what there are passing, not only one, two, but dozens of them, through the center of the State of Indiana, automobiles from New York City, from Boston, and, strange as it may seem, there were untold thousands of this character of tourists who made the trip this year from Boston clear through to San Francisco. We are past the days when State lines bind citizenship. We are arriving at a time when local citizenship, by reason of the growth of our transportation system, is becoming national in character. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do.

Mr. GORDON. Why not confine the contributions of the Federal Government to interstate roads, which would answer the very purpose the gentleman has described?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Every State road will become after a while an interstate road. [Applause.] Every State road is now an interstate road, for all these little feeders——

Mr. GORDON. There is a mistake there. This bill does specifically provide that this money is authorized to be used for local township roads leading to and from the county seat.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; it does not provide for anything other than——

Mr. GORDON. Let me read to you, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Let the gentleman take and study that while I progress, and then I will answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. I have read the bill, and I will ask the gentleman what this provision in the bill means:

That the roads which may be constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act shall include earth, sand-clay, sand-gravel, and other common types of roads, as well as roads of higher classes, one of the purposes of this act being to encourage and promote the improvement of a general system of roads leading from cities, towns, and railway stations into the adjacent farming communities.

Is not that a local system of roads, purely?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Its main purpose is to make these roads feeders for these larger roads, and there could not be a complete system of roads by simply a grand trunk line; there must be a system of roads to reach it to make it comprehensive.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Can the gentleman yield me five minutes more?

Mr. DUNN. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. All classes are interested in the question of transportation, interested in getting the thing desired from the place of its origin to the place of its consumption as expeditiously and as cheaply as possible.

Our great arteries of transportation are the railroads, rivers, lakes, and canals. The wagon roads are the veins and feeders. All are interested in having these veins and feeders so numerous and so well improved that the great arteries of trade may prove the greatest success possible to all the people. All classes, therefore, are interested in good roads.

It has been offered as an objection to this character of legislation that the rich automobilist is the one most interested in the construction of good roads, but I undertake to say that this gentleman has not as much real interest in the construction of roads as the workingman in the great commercial centers, who, perchance, never travels upon country highways at all. True, the tourist and the automobilist who go on pleasure bent are interested in good roads, and through their advocating the same much interest has been aroused throughout this country, and through this agitation much legislation in different States looking to the betterment of country highways has been enacted into law. But in the last analysis the real and lasting benefit derived from this character of improvement is not to the tourist. He is rather to be looked upon as a contributing member. He toils not, but he spends his money along the line over which he travels, which results in benefit to the butcher and the baker, and puts more money in circulation for the benefit of the community in general.

Every merchant is interested in good roads, for the reason that they increase his trade by putting him in closer and more immediate touch with the farmer.

The workingman who lives year in and year out within smoke-begrimed cities and factory districts and who does not use the public highways at all is interested in good roads, because every article that he consumes is affected more or less by the condition of the public highways throughout the country. The cost of living is influenced by the roads of the country, and to a greater degree than most people realize.

The railroads, rivers, lakes, and canals are all interested in good wagon roads, for they depend for their very existence upon these byways and highways of transportation.

Transportation begins at the place of original production and ends at the place of final consumption. So our great cities and great export centers are also interested in good roads and in their construction and maintenance.

The farmers of this country are vitally interested in road betterment, and anything that affects the farmer affects the citizen in every other walk of life. Farming is the greatest science in the world and has been practiced since the beginning of time, yet it seems there is the least known about it of any of the sciences. This fact is just beginning to dawn upon the farmer himself. The great agricultural schools, located in many of the States of the Union and assisted by the United States Government, through their scientific researches, are bringing home to the farmer the possibilities of the soil. They are teaching him how to revivify farm lands long since considered worthless, and to make these farms produce more than they did when they were first turned from virgin soil. They now fully realize that they can not constantly take away from soil productiveness and put nothing back to replenish, and expect a continuation of good crops. In consequence, through crop rotation and scientific fertilization, the soil is growing constantly more productive. Through the marvelous ingenuity of the inventor, farm life has been revolutionized in the last quarter of a century, and it is not now the drudgery it once was. Gasoline and electricity have been wonderful factors in farm improvement. They have revolutionized the work on the farm, until to-day we have in this country farms that are actually conducted without horses; and it will not be 10 years until the great farming interests of this country generally will be conducted from start to finish, from the planting of the seed to the harvesting of the grain and to the hauling of that grain to market, without the intervention of a horse. And with all these changes in the life of the farmer has come the desire for better roads, has come the knowledge of the necessity of better roads, has come the demand that must be met in their building and maintenance, if we are to secure from the farm the greatest good for the greatest number.

The farmer now realizes that it is necessary for him to keep books; that it is necessary for him to know the cost of production, to know the productive value of everything upon the farm, from the egg-laying value of the hen to the butter-fat producing capacity of the cow. He knows how and when to get rid of the drones. In arriving at these conclusions he must of necessity know the value of good roads for the accommodation of his farm.

One of the greatest items of expense to the farmer is that of transportation, and that expense is not alone to the farmer, it is to the consumer as well. It costs so much money to haul a ton of produce from the farm to the railroad station, and that sum of money results either in a loss to the farmer or else is contributed by the ultimate consumer. The time once was when this item was not reckoned by the farmer at all, but that time is past with the successful farmer. It may be of interest to know that it costs from 25 to 30 cents per ton per mile to handle the farm produce of this country from the farm to the railroad or wharf. Railroads handle the same produce on hauls of 30 miles and less at 2 cents per ton per mile, and where the haul is 150 miles or over it is made at a cost of one-half cent per ton per mile.

Great ado has been made about the freight rates charged by the railroads of the country and because of the effect of that charge upon the high cost of living. These railroad freight charges are practically nothing when compared with the wagon-road freight charge. And if the people will study this proposition of public-highway betterment from an economic standpoint as well as a purely selfish one, all will agree that money expended in highway improvement is a mutual benefit.

France has the greatest roads of any country in the world. She has 400,000 miles of macadam country road. She looks upon them as one of her greatest assets, as avenues of cheap transportation from factory and farm. In consequence of these splendid roads the product of the factory and farm in France is carried to market for less than one-third of what it costs to carry to market in this country.

It took centuries for France to build these good roads, and in getting them she went through all the primitive forms and trials that our country has and is going through in its endeavor to get good roads, and no doubt wasted as much money as we have wasted before they learned how best to build their roads and to get the greatest results from the money expended thereon. Originally France had no road system. Everybody made his own road. After a while a few neighbors organized a road district; after a while a few neighborhoods joined in a highway district; after a while turnpike acts were passed authorizing the creation of toll roads; and after long years came the agitation for national assistance, which was finally granted and national supervision exercised over the building of roads. All roads were built with reference to a system under scientific methods, and the result, the wonderful road system of France.

If this bill is enacted into law it will be the beginning of a Nation-wide system of good road building in the United States. Through it, and the additional legislation that will come from year to year as necessity demands it, road building will be reduced to a science.

Some of the older States are far behind some of the younger States in the roads that they have built. This law will awaken these old States from their lethargy and inspire within them a State pride to be up and doing in the matter of road building, that they may not longer be subjected to criticism by their neighboring States.

The State and the Nation should act together in making these improvements for they are of like interest to the State and the Nation, and every road built under this law will be a new bond binding closer the relation of State and Nation.

In these times of war and rumors of war the Nation should awaken to its interest in good roads everywhere throughout all the States, for there is nothing that facilitates the progress of an army as much as good roads and there is nothing that retards it more than bad roads. The item of transportation is the greatest with which a nation has to do in time of war.

The era of good road building is at hand. It is being taught in the agricultural schools throughout many of the States. It is being taught in farmers' institutes all over the land. It is being advocated by commercial clubs in every city of any consequence. Good-road congresses are being held in every State. All of which affords convincing proof that the people throughout the country are in favor of this character of legislation, for they realize that the progress of a State or Nation is best evidenced by its good roads. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I was one of the comparatively small number in the Sixty-third Congress who voted against a similar proposal that was before the House about two years ago. I think there were only 42 at that time who were recorded in the negative. I am inclined to think there will be a considerably larger number when a vote is reached upon this measure. I am still opposed to the bill. I see no reason to alter my opinion as a result of the changes which have been made in the text of the measure. Nevertheless, I do not think it is wholly bad. There are some provisions in it which are worthy of the attention and the approval of the House. For instance, the requirement that the States themselves must contribute before they can share in the disposition of the Federal fund is a highly desirable thing. There would be less agitation to-day against river and harbor measures, less clamor that they are nothing but pork-barrel and logrolling legislation if every State had to back up its own projects by substantial contributions before it could receive a penny from the Federal Treasury. While the principle of contribution contained in the present bill is sound, the percentage which the State must contribute is much too small. Instead of the Government being pledged to put in from 30 to 50 per cent, as the measure requires, it should probably not be pledged to put in more than one-third or one-half that percentage—say, 10 to 25 per cent of the total cost of the road making.

In other words, the measure ought so to be designed as to stimulate to the greatest possible degree activity by the States themselves. If there were a larger percentage required of the States, it would have that effect and would extend the making of roads much faster than is likely to be the case under the present measure, because the same amount of Federal money would go so much farther.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman mean to state that this bill provides that the Federal Government should pay from 50 to 70 per cent?

Mr. ROGERS. No; 30 to 50 per cent.

Mr. BLACK. That is right.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not think there is a great deal of force in the suggestion put forth by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] and concurred in the other day by my colleague [Mr. WALSH] that the passage of this measure would tend to have a paralyzing influence upon State activity in road making. I think it would have a stimulating rather than a benumbing influence; to my mind that objection is not sound.

My fundamental objections to this measure are three: The Federal Government should not embark upon this project at all; it certainly should not, in any event, be undertaken at this time of stress or unless we can afford it; the basis of distribution is illogical and unfair.

In the first place, this is not a proper activity for the Federal Government to undertake. Why? I can not answer any better or any more succinctly than the committee has done in its report recommending the passage of this bill. On page 4 of the report it says:

> Roads are local concerns, and primarily it is the duty of the States to provide them for their people.

"Roads are local concerns." It is true that under the Constitution, stretched and strained, it may be within the power of Congress to enact a bill of this sort; but, after all, if we examine the question fairly and carefully, we must recognize that roads are local concerns and should be treated as such. I think there could not be a better illustration of that than the fact that in all of the years of this Government only one proposal for Federal construction of a road has been adopted by the Congress, and that was something like a century ago.

"Roads are local concerns." Yet the administration of this bill will result in the creation of a horde of Federal road inspectors, prowling over the country to look at a corduroy road, and incidentally giving the more patronage to the party in power. It is one more and a long step toward bureaucracy and indefensible centralization.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Was the gentleman speaking of the Cumberland road?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the gentleman know that all the public lands in the States through which that road passed were charged with the contribution of 5 per cent of all the proceeds of sales, for the express purpose of making that road?

Mr. ROGERS. There was a contributory scheme in that measure, just as there is in this. I do not think it is a precedent, however, for the passage of legislation like this. Here we have a measure involving a yearly expenditure by the United States of $25,000,000. Yet "roads are local concerns."

Whether roads are good things or bad things is not the question. If that were the issue before the House to-day, there would not be a man who would speak or who would vote in opposition to this measure. Everybody would be for it, for of course they are good things. But that is not the same as saying that it is desirable for this Federal Congress to aid them by the expenditure of a very large sum of money.

There is often a tendency in this House and in every other legislature to decide a matter involving expenditure as if the sole question were whether it was a desirable thing. Whether or not it is attractive seems to be the test, not whether we can afford the expenditure. We are all agreed that good roads are desirable. They tend to bring the city and country together. They tend to assist people in leaving the congested centers and going out through the countryside, and, indirectly, in thus reducing the high cost of living. Of course they are a good thing, but that is not saying that we should undertake them through the aid of Federal appropriations. That, it seems to me, is the real test of this measure, and that is primarily why I am opposed to it. Schools are a good thing. Shall we therefore take schools out of the hands of the State or the city and town and turn them over, together with one-third or one-half the expense of the school system throughout the country, to the Central Government?

A good deal has been said on the floor, and the same is clearly to be inferred from the committee report, to the effect that we are paying rental for these post roads. I quote again from the report of the committee. On page 4, it says:

> It would be less expensive and more expedient to use the roads of the States as post roads than it would to construct and maintain an independent system. In such case it would seem but just that the General Government should make some contribution to the construction and maintenance of the roads which it thus uses.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Would it be asking too much for the gentleman to read the paragraph from the beginning? It is very short.

Mr. ROGERS. I will read the rest of it if you wish.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The part you want to read is in the beginning.

Mr. ROGERS. The part before that which I have read?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. It reads:

> To carry and deliver the mail is a function of the Federal Government, and it is its duty to provide itself with the facilities necessary to a proper performance of this function, such as postmasters, post offices, and post roads. A post road is just as truly a postal facility as is a post office. As in most rural communities, it has been found less expensive and more expedient to rent post offices than to build them, so it would be less expensive and more expedient to use the roads of the State as post roads than it would to construct and maintain an independent system.

The point I want to make is that this language is predicated upon a rental idea; the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], who has spoken this afternoon, very clearly and specifically put it upon that same ground. But look at the percentage that we are paying toward the cost of these roads under the guise of rent. In rural sections the carrier will, it is true, go over a country road once a day, or perhaps twice a day, for the delivery of his mail. But if from that circumstance, so mightily useful to the local communities, flows an obligation to pay rent, it necessarily follows that every use, however trivial, of city or State or county instrumentalities by the Government should be likewise compensated for by something in the nature of rent. Take, for example, the delivery of mails in our cities. The city carriers go about the streets 5, or perhaps 10, times a day for the delivery of the mail. If it is true that we should pay on the basis of rent for country roads which are traversed perhaps once or twice a day by rural carriers, why does not it necessarily follow that we ought to pay much heavier rent for the use of the city streets and city sidewalks by city carriers? I see no escape from that conclusion.

But even if the rental idea is to be defended at all, can anybody seriously urge that from 30 to 50 per cent of the total cost of the roads ought to be borne by the Federal Government for its trifling uses of them? I think that question carries with it its own answer. Yet that is the only theory, under the Constitution, by which Congress gets jurisdiction and has power to enact this law.

It is natural, of course, that the measure should be popular. Any measure which involves a "grab" is always popular. We all know how difficult it is to secure any specific economy. Somebody wants an appropriation, and the rest of us are pretty prone to help him get it, because we may need his help later. I do not think it is fair to say in justification of this bill that it is desired by a large proportion of this House or perhaps by a large proportion of the States of the Union. Of course they want it. But it is our duty to consider that this $25,000,000 a year—a very large sum of money—is being called for at a time when the Nation is already being very heavily taxed, and at a time when we all know that vastly greater taxes are likely to be put upon the people in connection with the program for national defense. Assuming that this bill should have been passed years ago, or that it, perhaps, should be passed at some time in the future, I can see no more inopportune time than the present to bring it before this House and make it a part of the law of the land—at a time when we have so many critical conditions confronting us, and when we have such need of enormous revenues with which to carry out the necessary plans for the security of the Nation.

Of course that argument will not appeal to certain Members like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY], who spoke yesterday, and perhaps not to the majority leader of the House [Mr. KITCHIN] and those who follow him in certain points of view which he entertains. But from the point of view of the vast majority of this House, who, I hope, are believers in large appropriations for national defense, I do not see how, either on the majority side or on the minority side, they can consistently and conscientiously advocate a measure of this sort.

Mr. Chairman, as I said at the outset, no one can oppose good roads. The primary questions are, in the first place, whether we can, at the present time, afford, as a Government, to expend $25,000,000 a year for good roads; and, in the second place, whether it is a proper activity for the Federal Government to undertake at all. There is also the consideration of whether or not this measure is equitable in its distribution of funds among the several States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. ROGERS. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. ROGERS. I will yield to the gentleman for a brief question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman is talking about preparedness. Does he know of any way by which $25,000,000 could be used for preparedness to better advantage under the present circumstances and at the present time than by the building of good roads?

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] made a complete answer to that inquiry in his questioning of the last speaker. The bill does not contemplate using this money exclusively, or at all, for military roads or even for interstate roads. That would be a different proposal. But here every lane and highway and byway of the Nation may be the recipient of Federal funds. The very first sentence in the bill says:

> That for the purposes of this act the term "rural post roads" shall be held to mean any public road over which rural mail is or might be carried.

Any little cow path is just as much entitled to this aid as the Lincoln Highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss this question upon the basis of whether or not the apportionment among the States is as fair as it might be made. Members favoring the bill admit that it is purely arbitrary. I realize that it is a difficult matter to make the apportionment upon any accurate and scientific basis, and I think that very difficulty suggests one of the inherent objections to the bill itself. That phase of the question was very fully handled and very adequately analyzed by my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and I do not care to go into it at this time. The proposed division is based upon a combination of three tests—ratio of population, ratio of post roads, and a fixed sum. But, after all, the population of the several States does not in itself constitute a proper basis for this division. Neither is the proportion of post routes in a State a fair basis of distribution; and the giving of a fixed sum outright to each State—Nevada and New York alike—of course has no possible defense. It was not even carried in the bill as introduced by the chairman of the committee in the last Congress.

I suppose if we were to have this apportionment made along logical lines the fairest method would be based upon the amount of mail carried in each State. That would entail consideration of the Federal use of the roads in the several States, and it seems to me would have a more direct bearing upon the proper division than any one of the three tests proposed in this bill.

This bill is not a desirable one for Massachusetts and similar States. Gentlemen favoring the bill have generally admitted that, but, very sincerely, no doubt, have asserted that Massachusetts thrives in other ways at the expense of her sister States, and that her sister States ought in this legislation to thrive at her expense. Of course, that is not a reason why we in Massachusetts like it, although it may be an excellent reason why we may have to see it passed. Massachusetts is a rich State, and we are proud to have it a rich State. I dare say it is fair for her to pay more than her share, but of the $25,000,000 that is to be raised yearly under this bill Massachusetts will contribute about 7 per cent of the total, according to the best estimate I can obtain, and the figures submitted by the committee show that in the aggregate she will get about 2.1 per cent in return. In other words, this bill costs Massachusetts about $1,250,000 a year. We are willing and expect to do more than our share, as we have always done, but we submit that the disproportion in this bill is out of all reason.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE].

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I have sat and listened with great interest to the able, eloquent, and erudite speeches made by the Members of this House on the important questions with which the Sixty-fourth Congress will have to deal in the next few months, and questions which are so vital to the people of this country; but, gentlemen, I do not think Congress will have a question as important and one that affects so much the happiness, prosperity, and welfare of as many of the American people as this bill now pending for your consideration.

This bill is a cooperative measure and authorizes an annual appropriation of not exceeding $25,000,000 from the Federal Government to all States, contingent upon the various States expending a like amount, and then apportions the $25,000,000 among the States in the following manner: Sixty-five thousand dollars to each State and one half of the remainder in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the population of all the States as shown by the latest Federal census, and the other half of such remainder in the ratio which the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes in such State bears to the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes of all States, as shown by the latest available report of the Postmaster General.

The building of good roads in this country is wholly an internal improvement, and the main purpose for constructing them is to make thoroughfares over which to transport the products and the people of the country. Improving the rivers and making them navigable is for the same purpose, but let us see how public roads have been discriminated against by the Federal Government in the appropriation of its money. I am not criticizing reasonable appropriations for rivers and harbors, but merely want to draw the contrast.

There are only 26,000 miles of navigable rivers in the Republic susceptible to improvement, while there are 2,228,042 miles of road, and yet the Federal Government has appropriated since it was organized $475,211,250 on rivers alone, exclusive of harbors and canals, and it has not appropriated scarcely anything for good roads. Is this just or fair to the people?

It costs the American farmer more for hauling his products from his farm on unimproved roads to the depot or river landing than from the depot or river landing to the market. His haulage on unimproved roads in the United States per ton per mile costs him on the products named below as follows: Corn, 19 cents; wheat, 19 cents; tobacco, 20 cents; cotton, 27 cents; hay, 19 cents; and potatoes, 19 cents. It costs him on an average of 23 cents per ton per mile on all the products he raises to haul them, and it costs the farmers of Europe with improved roads only as follows: France, 10 cents; England and Wales, 10 cents; Belgium, 9½ cents; and Germany, 8½ cents. The American farmer pays from 40 per cent to 95 per cent more for hauling his products from the farm to the railway station or river landing than the farmers of Europe. A ton of freight can be carried by steamer on the Great Lakes 1,000 miles for $1.25; it can be carried by railroad 250 miles; it can be carried by electric conveyances 25 miles; and on an unimproved public road it can be carried only 3 miles for that price.

There are 878,798,000 acres of farm land in the United States worth $28,475,674,000. The average per cent increase in the value of farms contiguous or in close proximity to good roads is from 75 per cent to 100 per cent. But let us be very conservative and say the average per cent increase is only 25 per cent. Now, if we had good roads all over this country, then instead of farm land being worth $28,475,674,000 it would be worth 25 per cent more, or $35,594,592,500, an increase in the market value of $7,118,918,500. Would this not be a good investment for the Government?

Let us take an item of the Government business. There are now 1,073,099 miles of rural free-delivery routes and 147,480 miles of star mail routes in this country, a total of 1,220,579 miles of both. The cost of service of rural free delivery in 1915 was $49,825,000, and the cost of the star route service for 1915 was $8,675,000, a total cost of $58,500,000. Everyone knows if all these rural and star routes were over good roads the year around the services could be maintained with the same efficiency for half that amount. If this is true, the Federal Government would save annually the sum of $29,250,000 on these miles of rural and star routes, and besides the rural and star route carriers, whose consistent friend I am, would have good roads the year around over which to transact the Government's business. Is this not a saving of sufficient magnitude to appeal to the American people?

If this bill becomes a law, it would mean at least $75,000,000 would be spent on the roads of this country every year, because every State in the Union, with the exception of Florida, Indiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas, have State aid road laws to the counties, and every State has a highway commission, except Indiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, and Texas. Take as an example my State, Kentucky; in 1914 the State legislature passed a State aid law for the building of good roads by levying a 5-cent road tax, and segregated this tax together with the license tax on automobiles to the road fund. This fund amounted to about $700,000 the first year. The act further provides that this money is available to the counties of the State for road purposes when the counties would expend a like sum. As a result, the first year after the law went into effect 104 out of the 120 counties of the State took advantage of the law, and as a result there were built last year over 400 miles of good rock road. [Applause.] The Committee on Roads estimates that Kentucky's proportion under this bill will be $580,274. This amount being available, it means that the State of Kentucky will expend this much, and the counties in the State will expend this amount, consequently three times the amount of $580,274 will be spent on good roads in Kentucky each year, and the same rule will apply with every other State whose law is like or similar to that of Kentucky. This law will not only aid and improve the rural communities of this country, but the cities and towns as well. Good roads will make the cities and towns more accessible, consequently more people will visit them, the same people will go more often, and by so doing will spend more money with the business enterprises of the cities and towns, and the natural result will be the market value of town and city property will increase, as well as the business of them.

There is a great talk of ample preparedness in this country. If we should be thrown into war with some foreign foe, and God forbid that we ever will, what would better prepare us for a successful combat with this enemy than to have good roads over which to transport our artillery, our armies, and our commissaries? There is nothing, in my judgment, that would prepare us better if war should ever come than to have splendid roads throughout this country.

I think it is high time the Federal Government was enacting some wholesome legislation that will be of direct benefit to the American farmer. The appropriations to the Agricultural Department of the Government, the establishment of rural and star mail routes, and the induction of the parcel post have been about all the direct legislation that the Federal Government has enacted for the American farmer in many years. Why should we not legislate in the interest of the farmer? He owns $69,467,124,000 of the wealth of this country, and pays more county, State, and Federal taxes in proportion to his worth than any other class of citizens of this Republic. The prosperity of the whole country depends upon the farmer. When he is prosperous, every other business thrives, and when he fails, bankruptcy inevitably follows. He is a wealth producer of this country, and not a parasite on its body politic. The American farmer added $9,872,936,000 to the wealth of this country in 1914; give him good roads and he will add more. The last census shows that 49,348,833 people live in the rural portions of this country, one-half of its population. If good roads only benefited these, would not it be a good investment?

What is the main objection offered against this bill? It is the one urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. He opposes it because he thinks some States per chance would pay a little more of the pro rata of the appropriation authorized by this bill than they should, and in return would not receive quite as much of the apportionment as is due them. Is this the circumscribed view that shall be taken on national legislation coming before this Congress? For over a hundred years the rural communities have been furnishing New England the raw material which has fed her spindles of industry and made them hum the tune of prosperity to her people. We were glad to be able to do this. We rejoice with you upon the progress and advancement you have made, and congratulat you on the grandeur of your achievements. We are all proud of the great cities of the East, because they are in America, and thanks to an all-wise Providence, the same flag that is kissed by the sea breezes as it floats over smoky New York and Boston is caressed by the gentle zephyrs of summer in Kentucky and other rural States of this Republic. I now want to extend an invitation to my good friend from Boston [Mr. WALSH] to come and visit old Kentucky. I want him one time to breathe the pure air of the country; to look one time at Heaven's cloudless dome; to gaze with delight one time at the brilliancy of the stars in a smokeless sky; to meet and mingle with her brave, loyal, and hospitable people, in a State where chivalry and hospitality are prerequisites to a successful career, where gallantry is the yardstick with which all men are measured and judged, and where pure womanhood is always respected and defended. When the gentleman shall have done this and returned to the "Hub of the Universe," I am satisfied that his views on national legislation will be broadened and his provincial viewpoint will be greatly magnified. [Prolonged applause.]

But above all benefits that will accrue to this country in dollars and cents, as I have tried to show, yet, in my judgment, there is a better and more lofty reason why we should have good roads in this country—the social benefit that will be derived. I was born and reared on the farm, a farm by which ran unimproved roads, and I know the disadvantages and hardships which surround it. However, I am glad of my early environment, as it brings experiences to a boy that will benefit him in after life that he can get nowhere else.

Let us have good roads so the bright-eyed boys and girls of the country, on whose shoulders soon will rest the perpetuity of this great Republic, can attend the country schools and prepare themselves for this great task without getting into the mud and mire. Give us good roads so the splendid farmer and his family can attend the country church and enjoy that great prerogative, which was bought by the patriotic blood of our forefathers, to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience, and to do so out of the mud and mire.

Good roads would prevent the high cost of living to a great extent. We hear so much these days the slogan, "Back to the farm." When a stalwart young man leaves the farm and goes to the city or town the power of production is impaired that much and the consuming class is increased in that proportion; hence the high cost of living. What could be a greater inducement for the farmer boy to return from the city back to the farm than for him to know that the farm is now accessible by good roads? What could add more to the happiness and comfort of the farmer than good roads? If we had good roads, that boy would go back to the farm. When he grew tired of hearing the whir of the spindles of industry of the great cities and when he grew weary of the congestion of people in the crowded marts of trade he would go back to the farm. He would stop, think of and contemplate the happy association of bygone years spent on the farm, and he would go back. He would cherish the happy recollections of the long ago in the sentiment of the poet, when he said:

Long, long be my heart with such memories filled,
Like the vase in which roses have long been distilled;
You may break, you may shatter the vase if you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang 'round it still.

On behalf of over 12,000,000 industrious farmers of the country, I appeal to you to support this bill. I believe you will, and when this bill shall become a law of this great Republic over 49,000,000 of people around their family firesides in the rural portions of this great country will pronounce heaven's choicest benediction upon every Member of this House who gave his support to this important measure. [Loud and continuous applause.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I am amazed that a committee of this House, a committee presumably controlled by friends of the administration of President Wilson, should bring in a bill of this character at this time. If there were no shadow of menace upon our prosperity and no serious foreign complications that threaten the maintenance of peace with foreign nations, and if at the same time there were an abundant surplus in the Treasury, there might be some excuse for such a bill. But none of these conditions are present. Our continued prosperity and the maintenance of peace are threatened, and the country is already burdened with extraordinary direct taxation of such a nature as to cause much criticism and complaint.

Nor is this all. The President in his address to the Members of the two Houses of the Congress on December 7 told us that the most important matter before the country to-day, the matter that lay at the very front of his whole thought as he addressed us, is the matter of national defense. He outlined a program, and then he added in words that ought to be burned into the minds of every patriotic American citizen:

At least so much by way of preparation for defense seems to me to be absolutely imperative now. We can not do less.

We can not do less, Mr. Chairman; we can not do less and continue to dwell in safety, and the President clearly implies that we ought to do more. The program of military and naval expenditures which the President outlined as the least we could do, the program that he regards and that every patriotic American citizen who has given the subject any serious study regards as the least we can do, as "absolutely imperative now," calls for an additional expenditure of almost $100,000,000, the estimate given being $93,800,000.

This will involve still more extraordinary taxation, direct taxation; yet gentlemen claiming to be friends of President Wilson and supporters of his administration bring into this House, and have the temerity to advocate a bill of this kind, a bill to distribute $25,000,000 from the Federal Treasury among the States, $25,000,000 that is not in the Treasury, and can not be got there unless by still more and higher extraordinary direct taxation.

I am amazed, as I have said, Mr. Chairman, that any committee controlled by Democrats should bring in such a bill at this time. The fact that it is now before us and that its passage has been strongly advocated by Democrats on the floor of this House points directly to one of two conclusions—either the Democrats who advocate it are not friends of President Wilson and are seeking to do everything they can to embarrass and retard the program that he regards as of the highest importance, or else they are utterly reckless and willing to place their petty, personal district interests above the interest of the country. There are Republicans, Mr. Chairman, who will vote for this bill on the theory that theirs is not the responsibility for the taxation that must follow. In accordance with the political ethics of the day, they have no hesitation in voting to embarrass an administration controlled by the Democratic Party. The country will probably have no high regard for their patriotism, but their districts may forgive them if some of the pork finds its way into local barrels. But what shall be said of Democrats who pursue such a policy? Will they not be regarded as traitors? Will the bribe of a few paltry dollars for their districts procure them forgiveness?

Mr. Chairman, this distribution of money which we have not got masquerades as a good roads bill. As a good roads bill it is a humbug. It does not distribute enough money in proportion to the mileage of roads in the country to scrape the mud off the roads once a year. There are some 2,000,000 miles of highways in this great country, for the alleged "improvement" of which this $25,000,000 might be used—a little more than $12 a mile. Why, Mr. Chairman, really good roads, according to present standards, cost a thousand times as much as that, and even bad roads cost a hundred times as much.

There are 1,204,262 miles of roads, according to the report of the committee, over which rural-delivery carriers or star-route carriers travel in the Postal Service. If the distribution of this money were confined to these roads, which the bill does not require, it makes only $20 a mile—a sum not worth considering. But gentlemen who advocate this bill will say the money is not to be distributed on each mile of road. It might be so used under the terms of the bill, but suppose it is all used in new construction. In that case all the money allotted to more than half of the States might well be used in one county of those States. As a sop to the small States the $65,000 minimum has been put in, but even with that sop only 17 States receive more than $500,000. One county in Michigan bonded itself for $600,000 not long ago for improved roads, and I have no doubt that the same thing has been done in many other States. In my own State we have spent four times this whole $25,000,000 in the past four or five years on our roads, and the amount allotted to New York will not match our maintenance charges alone. In short, in whatever way this money is spent, it is not enough to make a showing. If you want the Federal Government to do something for the roads of the country that the people can see, you must at least multiply this annual authorization in this bill by 10 and make it $250,000,000 instead of $25,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, the report of this Committee on Roads accompanying this bill says that "a post road is just as truly a postal facility as a post office," and goes on to say that "it would seem but just that the General Government should make some contribution to the construction and maintenance of the roads which it thus uses"; that is, for rural routes. Pure humbug! In whose interest are the rural delivery routes maintained; in the interest of the General Government, considered as a business corporation, or in the interest of the people who receive mail on the routes? Does the General Government make money out of the rural routes, or does it, on the contrary, lose money and maintain the routes for other than reasons of profit? Everybody knows that there is a tremendous loss in the Rural Delivery Service which is maintained, and rightly so, to give our farmers and dwellers in the open country that daily touch with the cities and the world which they ought to have. Every rural community gladly maintains its rural delivery roads at such a standard as the Post Office Department sees fit to set as a condition precedent to the establishment and maintenance of the routes, and if the department desires better roads it has only to raise the standard. Hence there is not only no necessity for any such distribution of money as this for the purpose of facilitating the distribution of the mail, but no sense in it whatever.

The bill is properly characterized as a "pork-barrel" bill. It it just that and nothing else. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committe do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUCKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7617, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PARCEL POST.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the parcel post.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—SANFORD TIMMONS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. ASHBROOK to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Sanford Timmons, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADDRESS OF SENATOR VARDAMAN.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an address made by Senator VARDAMAN to the people of the State of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6448. An act to authorize Butler and Dunklin Counties, Mo., to construct a bridge across St. Francis River; and

H. R. 4716. An act to authorize Dunklin County, Mo., and Clay County, Ark., to construct a bridge across St. Francis River.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 22, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 22, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, that through the terrible conflict now raging in half the world the good in man is pouring itself out to alleviate the sorrow and suffering of war's desolation. And we most earnestly pray that the good may reach the ascendancy in every heart; that wars may cease and man learn anew the lesson that where hate abounds strife, contentions, and wars abound, but where love abounds peace, joy, and harmony abounds; that the religion of brotherly love may have its sway and make the Old World blossom as the rose, and glory and honor and praise to Thee swell the mighty chorus round the world, "Peace on earth, good will toward men," forever and ever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent Mr. TILLMAN was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Charles W. Reeves, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, upon the request of Mr. WILSON of Louisiana, Mr. H. GARLAND DUPRÉ was granted leave of absence for 10 days, on account of important business.

RURAL POST ROADS.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7617.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7617, with Mr. BORLAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7617, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7617) to provide that the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall, in certain cases, aid the States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, Government aid to the States in the construction of roads has been a subject of controversy ever since the thirteen original States formed the Union. For 30 or 40 years after this Government was established it engaged in road building. Something like $14,000,000 was expended on the Cumberland Road, and the work on this highway did not cease until after, or about, the beginning of the era of railroads.

For the past 80 years nothing of any importance has been done in that line by the General Government except the creation in the Department of Agriculture of the Office of Public Roads. This bureau, it affords me pleasure to testify, incidentally, has not only given very valuable object lessons in the construction of experimental roads, showing the best materials for different kinds of roads and the best methods of using them, but has materially aided the several States in their work of road building.

In the great scheme of Government aid to public-road construction, however, this is but a drop in the bucket. The States spent $249,055,067 in road construction in the year 1914, and each year the amount increases. Meanwhile Congress has done nothing but talk about the matter. Bills enough have been introduced—some good, some bad, some indifferent—but none reached the point of enactment. Action, definite, conclusive action, has been too long delayed. It is high time something was done.

The State of Alabama, which I have the honor in part to represent, has made great progress in road construction within the last few years. The constitution of that State was amended by a vote of the people in the year 1901 so as to authorize the legislature to appropriate the net proceeds of the State convict department to aid in road building. Five years ago the legislature created a State highway commission and made an appropriation of $2,000 per annum to each county out of the funds of the State convict department to aid in road building. I had the honor to be the author of this legislation. Up to that time but little interest had been taken in substantial road improvement in many of the rural counties in Alabama. Under the provisions of that law the county was required to put up an equal amount to that appropriated by the State. While these amounts were small and only a few miles of model highway could be built in each county, it was enough to demonstrate to the people the advantages of good roads and aided in the creation of a better sentiment for good roads. There were only 3,780 miles of improved roads in Alabama when this State highway commission was created on the 1st of April, 1911, and four years later there were 7,195 miles of improved roads in the State, an increase of more than 90 per cent. This was chiefly the result of the small amount of State aid. Alabama is taking the lead among the Southern States in road building. [Applause.]

If such a small amount of State aid accomplished this much, a larger amount of national aid, as provided by the bill under consideration, would accomplish much more. This refutes the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that national aid would impair interest on the part of the States in road building. National aid will strengthen sentiment and interest for better roads in the States.

Several bills providing for national aid to roads have been introduced at this session. The one under consideration was introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Roads, and reported by that committee, of which I am a member. Some features of the bill I do not like. The old Members of the House who have been working for years for national aid to roads, a number of whom are members of the Committee on Roads, favor this bill and say that it is the best one that has ever been before Congress, and the only one that can pass both Houses of Congress at this time. I intend to vote for it even if it does not suit me in every respect, and when this bill is put on its passage I believe that every Member who favors national aid will vote for it and that it will pass the House by an overwhelming majority. It can be easily amended hereafter by Congress. But very few new laws are perfect. When Congress once adopts the policy of Federal aid to roads a good system will soon follow.

If the Department of Agriculture, as the representative of the National Government, and the State highway commissioners, as the representatives of the State, do their duty, and we must presume they will, every public road in every vicinity will receive its pro rata part of the money appropriated by Congress under the provisions of this measure.

This bill is, of course, only an authorization measure, which is the only kind the Roads Committee has jurisdiction to report. But as everyone knows the appropriation provided for in it will be reported by the Appropriation Committee and made by Congress if this bill is passed. The allotment to Alabama under the provisions of this bill amounts to $578,750 per annum.

The idea has been expressed in various forms that a people's progress and civilization can be measured by the degree of attention it gives to the building and maintenance of public highways. If this were a truism and applied to the United States we would certainly rate low in the scale of civilization, for, taken as a whole, the condition of our public roads is pitiful, indeed. According to the latest bulletin issued by the Office of Public Roads, the total of all public roads in the United States is 2,273,131 miles, and of those only 247,490 miles, or 10.9 per cent, are surfaced. All the rest are old mud roads. Rather a disgraceful showing, is it not, for the wealthiest Nation in the world, that prides itself upon its up-to-date methods in everything that goes to promote the activities and comfort of the people.

It is demonstrated by history that no country has good roads except where the government has aided in their construction and maintenance. In European countries all of the public roads were completed many, many years ago. Of all civilized countries, it is said that this country has the poorest roads. In almost everything else it stands first; in natural wealth, agricultural products, in the manufacture of steel and iron, and in the number of miles of railroads we stand first; still the farmers who contribute so much to the greatness of our wealth have received less consideration and have had less done for them than any other class of our people.

The National Government, from an economic standpoint, can well afford to aid in road construction. There are 1,073,099 miles of rural free delivery routes and 147,580 miles of star mail routes in the United States, a total of 1,220,579. With good roads the service could be improved and extended, where it is very much needed, for the same amount of money; besides, it would be worth so much to those who carry the star route and rural mails, and who, in my opinion, are paid less for their services than any other class of employees in the service of the Government for the same amount of work, and who, I think, should be paid more than they are at this time. There are 878,798,000 acres of farm land in the United States, valued at $128,475,674,000. Put the average increase by reason of good roads to farm lands at 50 per cent, which is very conservative, and it means an increase of about $29,000,000,000 in the value of farm lands in the United States. Is not this worth while? It will not be amiss, Mr. Chairman, to point out another very material advantage from good roads. In these days home seekers prefer to travel in automobiles where the roads are good rather than on railroad trains. It affords him an opportunity to get more information about the soil, climate, and social conditions in the various communities than he could acquire by traveling upon the trains, and in this way furnish the communities which have good roads an opportunity to advertise the advantages of their country and to sell their surplus farm lands to desirable settlers at good prices.

As Members of this Congress we owe the people of the United States no greater service than to provide national aid to roads and a system of rural credits that would meet the demands of the times. [Applause.] The people have waited long enough for this legislation. They not only expect national aid for roads at this session of Congress, but the establishment of a system of rural credits that would meet the needs and demands of our people. Such a system as they have in many other countries, and which will enable our farmers to borrow money on a long-term installment plan at a low rate of interest, with which to pay off the mortgages on their farms, and enable those who do not own a farm to buy one, securing the money on a long-term installment plan at a low rate of interest that would enable him to pay for a home in a few years' time with less money than he would pay as land rent during that period. Time, however, will not permit me to make further reference to that subject, but I shall have more to say on it when that measure comes before the House.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the leader on the Republican side, has expressed the opinion that the National Government will at some time go into the business of aiding in road building, and that when it does the appropriations will increase from year to year for that purpose; but that he does not think this is the time to begin. I fear if we leave it to those who oppose national aid to roads to say when we shall begin there will never be a beginning. [Applause.] Those who oppose this measure assign various reasons. Some say the condition of the Treasury will not permit of an appropriation for this purpose. This great Government can well afford it, and, if necessary, I would favor reducing other appropriations in order to secure money to aid in road building. [Applause.]

The most of the opposition to this bill, however, seems to come from Members of Congress representing districts in large cities, who base their opposition chiefly on the ground that it would be of benefit to the farmers alone. This would not be a valid objection, if it were true, but it is a mistaken idea. The cities of the country are dependent upon the products of the farms for their growth and maintenance. The products of the fertile farms of the Western States built and sustain, in a large measure, Kansas City, Chicago, and St. Louis. It can not be denied that the prosperity of the country depends upon the farmer. It is well known that when he is prosperous every other class prospers and when he does not all others suffer. Some of the Congressmen from city districts have suggested that Congress has done enough for the farmers in making provision for rural mails and parcel post. They seem to forget that these things are of as much interest to those who live in the towns and cities as those who live upon farms. If there should be an effort to abolish rural mails and parcel post, it would meet with as much opposition from the mail-order houses, publishers of newspapers, periodicals, and other business interests in the cities as from the farmers. They seem to have forgotten that millions of dollars have been spent by the National Government in the erection of post-office buildings in the cities, and that it was done under the same provisions of the Constitution of the United States that authorizes the Government to build roads. These post-office buildings are necessary, and the farmer makes no complaint; then, why are these gentlemen from the cities so narrow in their views as to oppose this measure, because it will be of some benefit to those who live in the country? They seem to forget that whatever is of benefit to those who live in the country is of benefit to those who live in the towns and cities. But even if this measure was only of benefit to farmers, which is not true, that would justify this Congress in making the appropriation, for more than half of our population live upon the farms, and they produced about $10,000,000,000 of the wealth of this country last year. They own more than $70,000,000,000 worth of property of the Nation, and pay more taxes—State, county, and Federal—than any other class of our citizenship. I am glad, however, to see a number of Members from the city districts, on both sides of the House, take a broader and more liberal view of the subject, and are supporting this bill.

According to calculations made by the Department of Agriculture, it costs the American farmer about 23 cents per ton per mile to carry his products from the farm to the railway station or river landing, and the annual charge for hauling of the 300,000,000 tons of products is estimated at $600,000,000. A frightful burden, indeed, on the initial process of marketing the crops. If our public roads were in approximately as good condition as those of most countries of Europe this charge could be easily reduced by one-half or more. If ever they reach the perfection of the highways of France, two-thirds of this expense can be saved to the farmer. Just another illustration. It is shown by reports of United States consuls in Europe that the lowest cost of hauling produce from farm to market is in Hanover, the average running 4⅛ cents per long ton per mile; in Italy about 9 cents; in France, 11¼ cents; in parts of Germany, other than Hanover, from 11 to 13 cents; in England, 12 cents. In the United States the hauling ranges, according to the products handled, from 19 to 27 cents per long ton per mile, the highest rate being on cotton. In other words, the American farmer pays from 40 to 95 per cent more to carry his products from the farm to the nearest railway station or river landing than the farmer in Europe. The only cause for this enormous advantage to the French or German or English or Italian farmer is the splendid highways which traverse these countries from one end to the other.

Let me make another striking comparison. I have already stated, and we all know, that this question of public roads has been discussed from every possible angle for years. In the course of one of these investigations about 20 years ago—and let me say that the basic facts of the statement I am going to quote are as true to-day as they were then—Stuyvesant Fish, president of the Illinois Central Railroad, wrote a letter to Gov. Lowry, of Mississippi, in which he said: "Circular 19, Office of Road Inquiries, bears date April 4, 1896. The grand total of the annual cost of hauling farm products and lumber on public roads in the United States, there given as $946,414,665, is based on data for the year ending June 30, 1895. In that year the gross sum received by all the railroads in the United States, from not only hauling all the freight but for also providing in addition the highways (railroads), the vehicles (cars), the motive power (engines), and drivers (trainmen), and paying taxes thereon, was only $729,993,462; that is to say, it cost the farmer and the lumberman of the United States alone $216,421,203, or, say, 30 per cent more in one year to haul their products on public roads than all of the railways received from freights of all kinds." [Applause.]

And as a clincher let me tell you that the cost of transportation per ton for 1,000 miles by steamship on the Great Lakes is $1.25, by steam cars for 250 miles it is $1.25, by electric power for 25 miles it is $1.25, and by horsepower on any public road for 3 miles it is $1.25. Does not this show the awful expensiveness of the farmer's work?

This Government has not been niggardly, Mr. Chairman, in the matter of appropriations for public improvements; roads, of course, being always excepted. The appropriations for irrigation projects in the fiscal year of 1914 were, in round figures, $106,000,000. For improvement of rivers and harbor there has been appropriated from the beginning of our national existence to August 1, 1914, the sum of $819,000,000, and on rivers alone $475,211,250. To aid in the construction of the Pacific railroads the United States Government gave its credit for hundreds of millions of dollars in bonds and in land grants along the right of way of these railroads. The appropriation by Congress to the Panama Canal to June 30, 1915, amounted to $394,399,149. Looking at these exhibits the proposition to appropriate $25,000,000 annually as the Government's contribution to aid the States in the building of public roads appears excessively modest.

Why, Mr. Chairman, it will require little more than half of what the Government has granted for rivers and harbors to give the States necessary funds to improve every public road in the United States.

The farmers have not made much objection to these great appropriations to which I have referred, even though many of them did not derive much immediate advantage therefrom. They have realized all along that the commercial and industrial needs of the country require pecuniary sacrifices which must fall alike upon all people. They know a great part of our commerce must be carried by water because of the cheaper mode of this kind of transportation and that rivers should be made navigable to this end. Nay, more, it has been preached to them by every public speaker in and out of Congress that the prosperity of the Nation, the expansion of its domestic and foreign commerce, the increase of transportation facilities by land and by water makes for the farmer's benefit no less than for the manufacturer's and merchant's. While they have paid and are still paying their share of the huge expenditures involved in these operations of the Government they have complained, and do still justly complain, that Congress has not at the same time aided in building roads. The farmer has asked himself, as well he might, how he is benefited by the building of railways and the improvement of rivers if the roads that lead from his farm to the river landing or railway station or other market are in such wretched condition as to wear out his wagons and teams, and at times made impassable by heavy rains and freezes. The farmer will not reap full benefits from the expenditure of all these hundreds of millions of appropriations to which I have referred until the country roads are put in good condition.

Thus we see, no matter from what viewpoint we look at it, that the expense of marketing the products of the farm must remain inordinately high until all the roads are improved.

The National Government, Mr. Chairman, has not been chary in the expenditure of large sums of money for building public roads in our island possessions ever since we acquired control of them.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. GORDON. For a question in reference to our island possessions.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I am forced to decline on account of the limited time allotted to me.

The latest annual report of the Philippine Commission shows that in the five and a half years ended December 31, 1914, there was expended in the islands on public-road improvement the very respectable sum of $3,250,000. As to Porto Rico, the report of the Government for 1914 shows that the cost of construction of roads and bridges from the time of our taking possession of the island until June 30, 1914, was $7,537,000. Not so bad for a territory little less in area than one-fourteenth of the State of Alabama. And the last Congress was generous enough to authorize the expenditure of $35,000,000 for the construction of a railroad in Alaska. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I am somewhat at a loss to account for the reluctance heretofore evinced by the Congress of the United States to make adequate money grants in aid of public-road building in the States, which in one single year have spent several hundred millions in this work. Why not be at least as liberal with the States which have waited for lo, these many years as with these outlying Territories that came under our beneficent domination only a little while ago?

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, I attach the greatest possible importance to that provision of this bill which takes care of the improvement of the little county roads. It is all very well to talk of the great trunk highways which it is hoped will be built; but, after all, of what avail will those great highways be if their feeders, all the county roads, are not put in condition to enable the farmer to reach the greater arteries? The roads that run straight from the farm are the important links in the chain of road improvement; and just as the chain is no stronger than its weakest link, so the whole scheme of public-highway construction will be faulty unless the byways are first taken care of.

There is another fact in connection with this matter which must not be lost sight of, and that is the increase in the value of farm lands by reason of road improvement. Without going into detailed figures I will only state that the experience of landowners is to the effect that, in sections where roads have been properly constructed and properly maintained the value of the farms have doubled and sometimes quadrupled. It will be indeed a joyful day for the American farmer when he finds not only the cost of marketing his products reduced by one-half or two-thirds, but the value of his farm materially enhanced. Incidentally, it may also be pointed out that with the increase in the market value of the land will come increase in the treasuries of the county and State, while the cost of maintenance is reduced to a minimum.

One of the vitally important effects of good public roads is the improvement of the social conditions of the rural population. It has been shown, for instance, that school attendance has been materially increased; social intercourse between the units of farming communities has become more frequent; the interchange of opinions on political, economic, and educational problems has been stimulated. In counties favored with good roads all the social activities of the community have received an impetus in a forward direction. So we see that the improvement of roads is not a question of material interest alone.

Another question of transcendent interest enters into the consideration of this matter of public-road building. It is the cost of living, not to the rural population merely, but to the dwellers in the city and town as well. We have all noted regretfully the steady and, I fear, ever increasing exodus from the farm to the city. The cause of it lies at the very threshold of the conditions surrounding farm life. The young people isolated from social intercourse, by reason of bad roads, are lured by the manifold attractions of the city, and the farmer has to pay more for his help, and the cost of production is increased. Either his already slight profits are still further reduced or, what is more likely to be the case, the cost of his product must be increased. This increase, of course, will grow in exact proportion as the producing class is lessened and the consuming class becomes more numerous. If some of our economists would figure out just how great are the losses sustained by this outgoing from farm to city, they would make a valuable contribution to the contemporaneous history of socio-economic conditions.

In this day and time, with rural route mail facilities, telephone, and improved conditions of our schools and churches, if our public roads could be made good our lands would not only greatly increase in value, but country life would be more desirable, and the tendency of immigration from the country to the towns and cities would abate, and our young men and young women instead of going to the towns and cities would stay upon the farms.

From whatever point of view we regard this question of Government aid to the States in the construction and maintenance of good roads, we must be impressed with its exceeding importance. It embraces practically every relation of the human family. It enters into the commerce of the Nation, the taxation of property, the education of the children residing in the rural sections, the social relations of farming communities, the comfort of rural homes, even the religious activities of the people on the farm. There is hardly any one other subject which so nearly concerns all the people; for if it be true, as the great Napoleon declared, that agriculture is the chief concern of the State, then, indeed, nothing that Congress can do to further its development can be objected to.

It is not, therefore, so much a question of whether or not anything shall be done, but what is the best means to be employed to bring the largest possible benefits to the greatest number of our people. With this conviction firmly rooted in my mind, I shall give my heartiest support to the proposed legislation, which, in my judgment, promises to contribute in the fullest possible measure to the prosperity and happiness not only of the farmers, but to all our people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON]. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I also yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, this question of good roads has been permitted to entirely obscure the important question involved in the consideration of this bill.

Now, I think I am as strongly in favor of good roads as any man in this House. Good roads are vitally necessary to every civilized people. Bad roads operate as an export tax upon the product of the producer [applause], and if they are bad enough they absolutely destroy the value of the products of toil. So I want to record my position here and now as being heartily in favor of good roads, and at the same time, if I can, make clear to this House why I am strongly opposed to the passage of this bill.

Now, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] who just preceded me referred to the good roads which were being built in the Philippine Islands, one of our colonial possessions; but I call the attention of the committee to the fact that those roads are built at the expense of the people of those islands, not at the expense of the people of the United States, and that makes all the difference in the world in the consideration of this question.

Members should not be confused by the different forms of government between that which is provided under the Constitution of the United States and that which is provided for the control of our colonial possessions. We are the sole governing power in the Philippine Islands, and this Congress, under the anomalous situation which obtains, is required to appropriate the money for all the expenses of those islands, but money for roads and other local improvements is raised by taxes imposed on the people of those islands.

Now, several gentlemen who have spoken upon this bill, attempting, I suppose, to give it some color of justification by the precedents in the history of the United States, have cited the one case which, it is contended, does furnish a precedent for this legislation, to wit, the Cumberland Road.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the legislation and the refusal to enact legislation by the Congress of the United States in connection with the Cumberland Road is the strongest possible argument against the enactment of this bill.

Now, what was the Cumberland Road, and when was it authorized, and under what circumstances?

The Congress of the United States, at the instigation of the President of the United States, Thomas Jefferson, in 1802, and at the time the admission of the State of Ohio into the Union was actually pending, passed a law authorizing the construction of a public highway from Cumberland, Md., to the Ohio River near Wheeling, W. Va., and in 1820 the act was amended to extend it to the Mississippi River and authorizing a survey of the route. In 1825 the first appropriation was made by Congress of $150,000 to extend it west and extend the survey to the permanent capital of Missouri, and provided that it should pass through the capitals of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. On April 30, 1802, Congress passed an act enabling the people of Ohio to form a State government and seek admission into the Union. Section 7 contained the following provision:

That one-twentieth of the net proceeds of the lands lying within said State sold by Congress shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same, such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the roads shall pass.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand the gentleman to say that he thinks this bill is unconstitutional.

Mr. GORDON. I have not said so yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Does the gentleman think that this bill is as constitutional as the bill which was up in the Sixty-third Congress with reference to good roads?

Mr. GORDON. Well, on that particular point, perhaps it is.

Mr. HARRISON. Did not the gentleman vote for that bill in the Sixty-third Congress.

Mr. GORDON. I did, sir. Now, that may be important; and if it is I will digress at this point to explain my change of attitude on this bill. [Laughter.] I voted for the bill in the Sixty-third Congress. These specious arguments that we have been listening to here, which never touched the real, vital objection to this bill, and my very strong predilection in favor of good roads and the lack of consideration of the merits of the proposition is my excuse and reason for having voted for it. So many questions commanded my attention at that time that I did not give this piece of legislation that careful investigation which I ought to have done before voting for it; but I have been endeavoring to make up for that since, and I think I now know something about my reasons, and the reasons which should impel others, to vote against this bill.

I was speaking of the Cumberland Road when I was interrupted. That was a very great improvement. But in 1822 the President of the United States, James Monroe, vetoed a bill the provisions of which undertook to impose tolls upon persons traveling upon that highway for the purpose of keeping it in repair. And I commend to the consideration of the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who interrupted me, the language of that veto message. The veto message itself is very short, but it was followed by a dissertation upon the powers of Congress and the relations of the Federal Government to the States which would well justify every Member of Congress and every intelligent citizen to read.

I will, Mr. Chairman, ask unanimous consent now to insert in the RECORD the short veto message of President Monroe upon that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the matter referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

VETO MESSAGE.

WASHINGTON, May 4, 1822.

To the House of Representatives:

Having duly considered the bill entitled "An act for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland Road," it is with deep regret, approving as I do the policy, that I am compelled to object to its passage and to return the bill to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, under a conviction that Congress do not possess the power under the Constitution to pass such a law.

A power to establish turnpikes, with gates and tolls, and to enforce the collection of tolls by penalties, implies a power to adopt and execute a complete system of internal improvement. A right to impose duties to be paid by all persons passing a certain road, and on horses and carriages, as is done by this bill, involves the right to take the land from the proprietor on a valuation and to pass laws for the protection of the road from injuries, and if it exists as to one road it exists as to any other, and to as many roads as Congress may think proper to establish. A right to legislate for one of these purposes is a right to legislate for the others. It is a complete right of jurisdiction and sovereignty for all the purposes of internal improvement, and not merely the right of applying money under the power vested in Congress to make appropriations, under which power, with the consent of the States through which this road passes, the work was originally commenced and has been so far executed. I am of opinion that Congress do not possess this power; that the States individually can not grant it, for although they may assent to the appropriation of money within their limits for such purposes they can grant no power of jurisdiction or sovereignty by special compacts with the United States. This power can be granted only by an amendment to the Constitution and in the mode prescribed by it.

If the power exist, it must be either because it has been specifically granted to the United States or that it is incidental to some power which has been specifically granted. If we examine the specific grants of power, we do not find it among them, nor is it incidental to any power which has been specifically granted.

It has never been contended that the power was specifically granted. It is claimed only as being incidental to some one or more of the powers which are specifically granted. The following are the powers from which it is said to be derived:

First, from the right to establish post offices and post roads; second, from the right to declare war; third, to regulate commerce; fourth, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare; fifth, from the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof; sixth and lastly, from the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States.

According to my judgment, it can not be derived from either or those powers, nor from all of them united, and in consequence it does not exist.

Having stated my objections to the bill, I should now cheerfully communicate at large the reasons on which they are founded if I had time to reduce them to such form as to include them in this paper. The advanced stage of the session renders that impossible. Having at the commencement of my service in this high trust considered it a duty to express the opinion that the United States do not possess the power in question and to suggest for the consideration of Congress the propriety of recommending to the States an amendment to the Constitution to vest the power in the United States, my attention has been often drawn to the subject since, in consequence whereof I have occasionally committed my sentiments to paper respecting it. The form which this exposition has assumed is not such as I should have given it had it been intended for Congress, nor is it concluded. Nevertheless, as it contains my views on this subject, being one which I deem of very high importance, and which in many of its bearings has now become peculiarly urgent, I will communicate it to Congress, if in my power, in the course of the day, or certainly on Monday next.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. GORDON. Now, what was the condition of the country at the time the Cumberland Road was built and what were the circumstances of the construction of that great highway? The Northwest Territory had been ceded to the people of the United States by the State of Virginia. The first State to be carved out of that great Territory, Ohio, was then engaged in preparing a constitution and applying for admission to the Union under the authority of Congress. The State of Indiana was not admitted until 1816, Illinois in 1818, Missouri in 1821, Michigan in 1837, and Wisconsin in 1848. By subsequent legislation the Cumberland Road act was amended so as to extend its western terminus to Jefferson City, Mo., the home of the distinguished author of this bill, Judge SHACKLEFORD. The circumstances attending the enactment of that legislation furnished absolutely no precedent for this, and the considerations of James Monroe in his veto message, in which he forbade the use of the money of the United States Government for the purpose of maintaining this Cumberland Road, seem to me to furnish unanswerable reasons against it.

The road, as you know, was subsequently——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. GORDON. I will in a minute. The jurisdiction over this road was subsequently transferred, as you know, to the States through which it passed, who thereupon imposed tolls for the purpose of defraying the expenses of keeping it in repair.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Cumberland Road was built exclusively from the proceeds of the sale of public land?

Mr. GORDON. You did not. If you did, you misunderstood me.

Mr. MONDELL. That was true of the first legislation, I understood the gentleman to say.

Mr. GORDON. The act providing for the building of the road contained the provision that 5 per cent, one-twentieth of all the proceeds of the sale of public lands in the State of Ohio, and I believe the other Territories through which the road was to pass, should be appropriated to defray the expense of the construction of the road. The provision cited from the act of April 30, 1802, authorizing the people of Ohio to organize a State government, is referred to in the first act of Congress for building the Cumberland Road.

Mr. MONDELL. But the road was not built exclusively from that source?

Mr. GORDON. I am not prepared to say whether or not the proceeds of the sale of the land reimbursed the Government. Of course, appropriations were made directly out of the Treasury of the United States as the work upon the road progressed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was it the custom at the time of which the gentleman speaks for the Congress to authorize loans upon public lands, the loans that were secured as a rule by foreign nations, partly for the construction of roads and sometimes for the construction of canals?

Mr. GORDON. I know of no such act of Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is giving us an interesting historical discourse, and I am very much pleased with it. If it will not divert him too much, I would like to ask him whether he knows that prior to the reading of the dissertation of President Monroe, which is quite a lengthy message, as we know, that the Congress of the United States was asked to permit of the use of public lands for the purpose of raising funds to build a canal to bring the Great Lakes to the sea, and whether, Congress having refused to make such a grant, the State of New York embarked upon that enterprise itself and constructed the present Erie or State Barge Canal?

Mr. GORDON. I am not prepared to dispute the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Considering many requests made of the Congress of the United States, I can believe almost anything might have been requested in times past. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I merely wanted the gentleman to know as a historical fact that Congress did reject the proposition to build the canal, and that it was built by the State of New York.

Mr. GORDON. I thank the gentleman. That furnishes, of course, another precedent against this bill.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman's legal objection to this bill that it provides for the building of roads within the States and not for interstate roads?

Mr. GORDON. That is just one of my objections to it; yes. My principal objection to this bill, Mr. Chairman, is stated in the report of the majority of the committee recommending the bill for passage, that it is purely a local matter for which you propose to ram your hands down into the Public Treasury of the United States and take out money. That is my principal objection to the bill, which I will elaborate as I progress.

Mr. KELLEY. Your objection is not legal, but you object to it as a matter of policy?

Mr. GORDON. Oh, I do not care what you call it. I suppose this House has a perfect right to pass upon the constitutionality of a measure when it votes upon it. I think it does pass upon its constitutionality.

Mr. KELLEY. I understood the gentleman was making a legal argument, and I wanted to make clear in my mind to just what point it was directed.

Mr. GORDON. I thank the gentleman for the compliment, if he considers what I have said in my time is a legal argument. It is not cohesive, and I am not depending so much on the law as I am on the logic of the undisputed facts.

Mr. CROSSER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. CROSSER. Not indicating my own position, I agree with you that we ought to regard the matter from the standpoint of philosophy and argument rather than figures. How far would the doctrine—this idea of having each locality build its own roads—take us? Supposing that we should pass a law in the States requiring each township or ward to build its roads and not requiring it to build any other ones. Would not that cause disastrous results?

Mr. GORDON. No. That is the law now in every State in the Union that I know anything of.

Mr. CROSSER. Another question.

Mr. GORDON. Very well.

Mr. CROSSER. Suppose some of the counties in the State would build and others not. Would it not prevent a free access from one county to another?

Mr. GORDON. Undoubtedly; but let those counties stew in their own juice until they get ready to tax themselves to build it. [Laughter.] If that interferes with interstate commerce, then I grant you that we might consider the question.

Mr. CROSSER. That is the point I am coming to.

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Now, this bill itself, in order to make it perfectly clear that it is purely a local bill and that it is intended to use this money to build and improve township roads, contains this provision:

SEC. 5. That the necessary culverts and bridges shall be considered as parts of the roads constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act; that the roads which may be constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act shall include earth, sand-clay, sand-gravel, and other common types of roads, as well as roads of higher classes, one of the purposes of this act being to encourage and promote the improvement of a general system of roads leading from cities, towns, and railway stations into the adjacent farming communities.

Now, those roads are very desirable, Mr. Chairman; but those are roads of the kind that in my State and in every other State, so far as I know, are built by assessing a part of the cost upon the local community which receives the primary benefit from the construction of the road. We have in my State a system of road laws under which the State pays a portion and the local community pays a portion. We have a State highway commission which qualifies us to receive our apportionment under this act, but in the construction of roads our State highway commission does not pretend to go into townships and construct purely local roads. It does not understand its function to be any such thing as that. These local roads are built by taxing the local communities. They are local improvements, just as this report says, and I know of no State in which they tax the people of the whole Commonwealth to build purely local roads.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The gentleman says that the State cooperates with the counties?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The local subdivisions of the State?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the gentleman think that policy a wise one?

Mr. GORDON. Yes; a very wise one.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then why can not the same policy be applied to the United States cooperating with the States and counties?

Mr. GORDON. I do not say it could not. Otherwise, I would not be here making this speech. I am trying to prevent its being applied. [Applause and laughter.]

Now, the question of the gentleman from Tennessee illustrates my point for me quite as well as I could do it myself. The relation between the States and their local subdivisions are entirely different from the relations between the Federal Government and the States. The latter relations are defined by the Federal Constitution, and the gentleman from Tennessee knows enough to know that there is no real analogy between the relations existing between the States of this Union and the Federal Government and the relations existing between the States themselves and their local subdivisions. They are local creations. For convenience the States, acting through their legislatures or their constitutions, subdivide for convenience the States into counties and townships, and enact the necessary legislation to give as nearly as may be in local affairs home rule and local self-government. The wisdom of that system has never been successfully challenged. And as an incident to their local control and self-government, they require them to pay their local taxes.

This talk that it is a nice thing to have good roads and that therefore you should vote for this bill is exceedingly fallacious. It is a nice thing to have these farms out in these States drained. Drainage is quite as vital and as essential as anything else.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GORDON. I do.

Mr. WHEELER. If this bill should become a law and appropriations should be made, does the gentleman think that in the near future, or in the future at any time, it would affect his district? Or, in other words, are there any farmers in his district?

Mr. GORDON. Well, in answer to the gentleman's question, I will say that there are no farmers in my district, but all the roads in my district were constructed and paid for by the people of my district. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Is that the reason why the gentleman is opposed to the bill—because there are no farmers in his district? [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. Well, that is one reason, and a pretty good one, too. [Laughter.] Now, inasmuch as the gentleman called my attention to that fact, I think I understand my duty as a Member of the National Congress. I do not permit mere local considerations to control my attitude upon public questions; and if I did not think that this bill was a bad bill, regardless of its immediate effect upon my own constituents, I would not be here talking against it. [Applause.] I think it goes very much further than that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the gentleman to say that the last time he voted for the roads bill and that this time he is very much opposed to it.

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. And the gentleman has given us some reasons why he has changed?

Mr. GORDON. Yes. And I will give you some more if you will give me the time. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman has just stated that he has no rural population in his district. I want to ask the gentleman what the farmers in his district, that were in his district in the Sixty-third Congress, think of this proposition? [Laughter.] I notice that there were three rural counties in the gentleman's district at that time. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. I will say, in answer to that, that so far as the farmers living in my former district are concerned, they have, most of them, had their roads improved by the city of Cleveland. We have county-road laws in our State under which they have constructed in the county of Cuyahoga over 400 miles of brick roads outside of the city. We have more good roads than any other county in the United States.

This question is not new to us, and the reference of the gentleman to my former constituents is answered, I think, by my previous observation. I am not controlled by any such consideration as that. I think the reasons against this bill are very much deeper than any mere matter of local concern. I might just as well charge these gentlemen here, who represent rural constituencies, with voting for this bill solely and only because their constituents are in favor of good roads. [Applause.] That is the way some of them talk, and I believe it. [Laughter.]

Now, I read from the report of the majority of the committee, recommending the passage of this bill:

> Roads are local concerns, and primarily it is the duty of the States to provide them for their people.

Now, I agree to that. I say that is a strong argument against this bill. In fact, there is the foundation of my objections to this bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. GORDON. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 2½ minutes remaining.

Mr. GORDON. No; I will not yield. You see my time has all been taken up by these questions and I have not been able to say what I wanted to say.

> Jurisdiction over roads—

I still read from the report of the majority of the committee—

> Jurisdiction over roads belongs to the State and local authorities.

Yes; and James Monroe, in his veto message, said that Congress could not lawfully confer power and jurisdiction on the National Government in the matter of the repair and maintenance of roads by collecting tolls.

> This jurisdiction should never be disturbed by the General Government.

I fully agree to that. It never will be disturbed, either, until you amend the Constitution of the United States. Now, as we have no jurisdiction over these roads, no power to supervise their maintenance, why should we take money out of the Treasury of the United States to build them? I wish the gentlemen on the floor of this House who are strongly in favor of good roads and who are supporting this bill would answer some of these vital objections suggested by their own report in support of the bill. That is the question that is bothering me. It is not a mere question of whether or not my district will get some of the "pork" that this bill provides for. I suppose my State will get its share. That is a very small consideration, however.

But in connection with the money involved I call your attention to the fact that they provide at the end of the bill that not more than $25,000,000 shall be used the first year. You see this is providing a continuous performance of taking money out of the Treasury of the United States and expending it upon matters which are admitted and conceded by the committee itself to be purely local. I want you to understand, gentlemen, that this is a very serious proposition. When you enact this measure into law you are establishing a precedent for almost every conceivable form of local improvement to be made at the expense of the Public Treasury of the United States. [Applause.]

Furthermore, the law removing the rural counties from my district and enacting the present redistricting law was approved by the governor of Ohio on May 6, 1913, and the Shackleford road bill, which passed the House in the Sixty-third Congress, was not voted on until February 10, 1914, nine months and four days after the rural territory was separated from my district, so that the imputations involved in the questions, ascribing to me a desire to "pander" to the interests of my rural constituents in voting for the bill in the Sixty-third Congress, fall to the ground.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have great sympathy for my friend from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] who has just taken his seat. Like all fresh Democrats when they come into this House, he has trouble with the Constitution of the United States. They all do at first. Now, the Republican Members, new or old, never have any trouble with the Constitution of the United States if it gets in the way of doing something that they want done. Their protective tariff proclivities show exactly the measure of their ideas upon the Constitution of the United States; that is, their regard for it. If they would write into a tariff bill these words, "The object and purpose of this bill is to prohibit the importation of foreign merchandise into this country to be sold in competition with our own," it would be unconstitutional; but although that is the real purpose of it, if they say in the law it is to raise revenue, although it accomplishes an unconstitutional purpose, of course, the courts say, "We can not say that it will not produce revenue, we can not say that revenue will not follow from the operation of this act, and therefore it is constitutional."

Now, I want to say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] that I have as much faith in him as anybody with reference to the effect upon him of the demands which his former constituents may have made upon him; but we are the creatures of our constituents, and if he, without having given a former bill thorough study, when he had three rural counties in his district, voted for it, and afterwards, when they were cut out of his district, gave it such further study as to enable him to arrive at his present conclusion, it is no reflection on him; we all give the benefit of the doubt to our constituents unless study or conviction rises higher with us than a desire to please our constituents. So I do not blame him, so far as I am concerned.

But let me say to my friend that the appropriation of money out of the Public Treasury for the purchase of garden seeds to give to private individuals is not a Government function.

Mr. GORDON. No; and I voted against it.

Mr. SIMS. Why, certainly; but does not the bill pass every time, and do the people not get the seeds, and do they not take them and make good use of them as individuals, but not in the performance of any Government function?

Mr. GORDON. Oh, well, that is no answer to my position.

Mr. SIMS. I myself believe in confining Federal appropriations to the maintenance of strictly Federal Government objects and purposes; but is taking care of the earthquake sufferers of Messina and Martinique a Federal Government purpose? Why, not at all; but it is within the purposes and impulses of humanity and human sympathy, and, after all, if we violate the Constitution in such an act, I have never known the Attorney General of the United States or anybody else to begin a suit to enjoin the payment of such an appropriation.

This bill is not my bill. In fact, I opposed, as vigorously as I knew how, the bill that came from the Agricultural Committee which provided for the payment of money for the use of roads by rural carriers to local authorities in the States at so much per mile, according to the quality and standard of roads. That proposition, as I regarded it, was simply a subsidy, upon condition that the States or local authorities appropriated the same amount for the same roads. I fought that bill all the way through, and voted against it on a yea-and-nay vote. Since then the Roads Committee has been created, and when the bill came from that committee last Congress, which provided for the possibility of the use of the money in the only way that it ought to be used, I voted for it.

Mr. Chairman, on the 10th day of December last I introduced the following bill, which is my scheme for the construction of Federal post roads. I want to say to you that in legislation no man can get exactly what he wants, and when I can not get my bill, but can get something to take the place of it, and out of which a great system may be established, I will not stand here in the pride of authorship and oppose a bill which accomplishes many of the objects and purposes of my own measure. Now I will read my own bill:

A bill to provide that the United States shall construct rural post roads between the county seats of the several States.

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to construct and maintain rural post roads the Postmaster General is authorized to designate all highways connecting county seats in each of the several States as rural post roads.

SEC. 2. That the Postmaster General, after making deductions hereinafter provided for, shall apportion the appropriations made under the provisions of this act for each fiscal year, among the several States in the following manner:

One-third in the ratio which the area of each State bears to the total area of all the States; one-third in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the total population of all the States, as shown by the latest available Federal census; one-third in the ratio which the mileage of rural post roads of each State bears to the total mileage of rural post roads in all the States.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, the sum of $25,000,000. So much of the appropriation apportioned to any State for any fiscal year as remains unexpended at the close thereof shall be available for expenditure until the close of the succeeding fiscal year.

SEC. 4. That so much of the appropriation made under the provisions of this act as the Postmaster General may estimate to be necessary, not to exceed 5 per cent, shall be deducted by him at the beginning of each fiscal year for administering the provisions of this act, and any portion of such amount unexpended at the close of any fiscal year shall be made a part of the appropriation for the succeeding fiscal year and reapportioned according to this act. Within 60 days after the final passage of this act, and thereafter on or before January 20 next preceding the commencement of the fiscal year, the Postmaster General shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount which he has apportioned to each State for such fiscal year. All payments under this act shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury on warrants drawn by the Postmaster General.

SEC. 5. The term "rural post road" as used in this act shall be deemed to include all public roads over which the United States mails are or may be transported, that connect the county seats of contiguous or adjoining counties. The Postmaster General shall cause to be made such surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates as he may require, and shall advertise for bids for all of the work or do the work as may otherwise be provided for by the laws of the United States.

SEC. 6. All road work in the several States done under the provisions of this act shall be under the direct supervision of the Postmaster General. The final cost of the work shall include a reasonable expense for engineering, inspection, and unforeseen contingencies not to exceed 10 per cent of the total cost of the work.

SEC. 7. That out of the appropriation provided by this act the Postmaster General is authorized to employ such assistants, clerks, and other persons, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, to rent such buildings in the city of Washington and elsewhere, to purchase such supplies, material, equipment, office fixtures and apparatus, and to incur such travel and other expenses as he may deem necessary for carrying out the purpose of this act.

SEC. 8. That the Postmaster General is authorized to make rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That the Office of Public Roads, Department of Agriculture, shall be transferred to the Post Office Department.

SEC. 10. That in order to carry out the provisions of this act, the Postmaster General is authorized, by contract or condemnation, to acquire all needed rights of way, and to pay for such rights of way out of any moneys appropriated under this act.

SEC. 11. That roads constructed under this act shall be of uniform standard of width and quality and of hard surface, and upon an average shall not exceed in cost the sum of $10,000 per mile.

I confined the construction of roads by my bill to such roads as lead from one county seat to county seats of each adjoining county under the idea that there necessarily must be a large amount of mail, including the parcel post, moving between county seats. And, it being a postal facility, the moving of mail matter, I have placed it where I thought it ought to be, under the Postmaster General, because all these bills that have been introduced have been in the nature of preparing post roads.

I propose that the Government of the United States, out of its own money, without any cooperation or consent of the States or the counties, shall build post roads from each county seat in each State to each and all adjoining county seats, even where State lines had to be crossed. That is a real Federal road and performs a regular Federal function. I never believed in State aid for the Federal Government in performing an exclusively Federal service. What is going to be the result of the increase in the parcel post? It is purely a transportation service. The carrying of a letter is purely a transportation service. If you can carry one pound of ordinary merchandise as a Federal function, as far as constitutional authority is concerned, you can carry a ton or a thousand tons, and if you can carry a ton you have a right to provide facilities for most economically and cheaply moving that ton of freight. This bill we are now considering in effect potentially covers every road in the United States, covers all the State public roads, covers all the county public roads—in fact, may cover all the public roads. One of the objections I have to the bill now being considered is that the title misleads. In the latter part of this bill is expressed the real object and purpose of it, and it should not be limited in the title as this bill is limited. The title of this bill is:

A bill to provide that the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall, in certain cases, aid the States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

I hope the committee will offer an amendment that will so amend the title of the bill as to include all purposes for which these roads can be used, and not limit it to postal use only, because upon that we might have questions of construction and a controversy arise. The Secretary of Agriculture might say, when a proposed plan was put up to him, that we did not need all the roads proposed for the Postal Service only. A mere declaration that all roads may be so used is different from the practical application of such a declaration to all the roads. Why not let it go under the general-welfare clause that covers everything under heaven and includes every national purpose for which roads may be used? I hope the title will be so amended that the use of money will not be restricted to postal roads.

We southern Democrats are very much afraid of paternalism; we are in favor of State rights, but when the States are not able to give their citizens such improvements as will enable the people themselves to rise in the scale of civilization and national usefulness, and if it should be deemed necessary we ought to introduce a resolution to amend the Federal Constitution, so that the National Government may be enabled to do that which the States, at least some of them, can not do for themselves, that is necessary to be done in order to have uniform national development.

I am in favor of any proposition that can be enacted into law that will give good roads to the whole Nation, but if the Constitution stands in the way of so good a thing we ought to amend it. We have done it before and we can do it again. But I take it that the lawyers on the committee have investigated this matter and find that it will stand the constitutional test. All I ask of the committee is that, if you can not get your bill through another body in the present form and you can get mine through, or something like it, to do so, so that good-road legislation will not be an absolute failure. I voted against a former bill, and I am glad I did and that it failed, for this is the best bill that has ever been reported to the House. It distributes the fund according to the population and road mileage, and I do not believe there is a Secretary of Agriculture living, or ever will live, that will dare to approve automobile roads laid out in a State and deny people who haul corn, wheat, cotton, and other farm products an opportunity to have their roads improved.

Of course this $25,000,000 is just a starter. It ought to be a starter. We have got to have time to prepare for the work on the roads and to acquire road machinery and to put our things in working order; but the day will come when instead of spending $25,000,000 a year we will spend $200,000,000 a year, perhaps $500,000,000 for this most justifiable purpose. [Applause.] But the more we spend economically and scientifically, the sooner will the country be redeemed from its present condition of primitiveness.

In the Southern States the bridges were all destroyed—nearly every one of them—during the Civil War. Our courthouses were practically all destroyed—burned up—our public buildings of every kind, including colleges and schoolhouses, lodges, and churches were burned or destroyed, so that we could not with our limited taxable resources improve our roads like the Northern States have improved theirs. We had to first restore these absolutely necessary structures. I hope and pray that however much you may love the Constitution, and nobody loves it more than a Democrat, that we will not let a constitutional doubt stand in the way of that which will benefit every section of the country in the United States. Let us give the people the benefit of the doubt, and if the courts should eventually solve the doubt against the validity of the law, its execution in the meantime will have redounded to the greatest general public good.

The construction of highways is one of the public purposes for which, I believe, both National and State Governments exist, and, I think, it is prudent and wise if necessary to issue bonds for their construction. If the construction is good, maintenance cost will be correspondingly light, while if the construction is poor, maintenance will be a burden almost beyond the power of the States or the Federal Government to bear.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BOOHER). The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this legislation. It has been my pleasure to support a measure somewhat similar to this one; it passed the House but nothing was done toward its passage in the Senate, but I trust that a better fate awaits this one at the other end of the Capitol. Many years ago this Government realized the importance of railroad building, and it donated to railroad companies for that purpose millions of acres of public land. These railroads have greatly developed the country and provided splendid agencies for commercial intercourse between the various sections of the country. But, Mr. Chairman, the work of road encouragement and road building is only half done and the good to be derived only half realized until we build a system of public roads throughout the rural sections of this great country. [Applause.]

The railroads are not doing the amount of good or rendering the highest measure of service to the people generally because the means of communication between railroads and the great farming class of our people are poor and inadequate.

Mr. Chairman, when this country can boast of a splendid system of country roads leading from the homes and farms of the rural districts to the railroads traversing the country, bringing the producer into quick and easy reach of the marts of trade, we will have contributed to the material prosperity, the well-being, and happiness of millions of American people. [Applause.]

This Government is now expending vast sums of money teaching the farmer how to increase the productivity of the soil and how to farm under scientific methods, and now it is incumbent upon us to set ourselves to the task of removing the difficulties and obstacles that stand as barriers between the farmer's produce and the markets on the railroad. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, if the time should ever come when we would need these highways in case of war they would serve us well. We would then need such roads as they have in Germany and France. Napoleon did no greater service to France than that rendered in building a system of public roads in that country. Our country is too great, powerful, and rich to longer permit these roads in the rural regions of the country to remain as a handicap and hindrance to the growth and development of our rural population. [Applause.]

The completion of such a system of roads as this bill contemplates will bring to the farmer new opportunities, promise, and possibilities, and bring to him comforts and conveniences long desired, and bestow blessings and benefits that can come through no other governmental action. [Applause.] It will enhance the value of his property and make life on the farm more attractive, and by the passage of such a measure, Mr. Chairman, we will contribute to the substantial growth and development of our agricultural classes and enable those who toil to produce that which feeds and clothes the world to reach with their produce the markets of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I have no particular desire to attempt to make a speech, but I do wish to express my views upon this bill, not in any spirit of criticism, but rather as representing what I deem to be the sentiment of the district which I have the honor to represent. I want to say also that I am proud to be a humble Member on this side of the aisle, with these veteran Republican leaders, and particularly our great leader—leaders able, astute, farsighted, having only and always at heart the public interest, leaders who in their distinguished careers in this House have frequently and persistently pointed out the clear and sure way to general prosperity in this country, not prosperity that is spasmodic and unhealthful, but prosperity based upon the healthful commercial, agricultural, and industrial activity of the people.

There are many reasons why I oppose this bill. One of them is because, in my judgment, Federal aid in the construction of roads under this act would be a form of paternalism that ought not to be instituted nor fostered by the Federal Government. I am in favor of good roads. We all are. The great State that I represent in part has in the last few years spent upward of $100,000,000 in constructing and improving the roads in the State. We are preparing to expend millions more this year and expect to spend millions hereafter every year. I think, perhaps, that one great incentive to this road building in my State was the agitation of the automobilists and the tourists. They certainly gave us no rest, and I think that in the agitation which they started and continued it must be conceded that they rendered a great public service.

I think that this bill has been very skillfully drawn in the interest of those who expect to participate under its provisions; but so far as the bill itself is concerned, so far as getting any practical results from the working of the bill, in my legal judgment it is as full of holes as a sieve. As I understand it, under this bill—and if I am in error I will stand corrected—the State of New York would get as her apportionment about $1,500,000, and in return her proportion which she would ultimately stand, based upon an annual appropriation of $25,000,000, would be something like $4,500,000, or upward of $5,000,000. In other words, the State of New York under this bill would contribute each year for the purpose of building roads in other States—1,000, 2,000, or 3,000 miles away—something over $3,000,000 a year.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully decline to yield. I have sat here now nearly 40 days listening to an almost continuous talkfest, and I think I am entitled now to 10 minutes.

Mr. HULBERT. I ask the gentleman to yield for one question.

Mr. MAGEE. I want to say further that I decline to yield. All the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle might as well understand that all the ballast in the ship of state is not contained in one section of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, it has been suggested here that the Northern and Eastern States, California, perhaps, and other States are opposed to this bill. It has been insinuated that they are niggardly, narrow-minded, and all that sort of thing. Now, so far as the State of New York is concerned, I will eliminate that part, and I do not put my objection upon that ground.

If you can mulct the State of New York that is willing to build her own roads, if you can mulct her to build roads 2,000 miles away in other States, and get away with it, why, I will take off my hat to you. But what I say is that I base my opposition upon principle. New York State has always been generous. She built the Erie Canal and made it free, thus conferring great advantages on many other States. We are now building as a substitute therefor the new Barge Canal which will cost the State upward of $130,000,000. We have expended millions upon millions of dollars upon our highways, and I want to say that the great State of New York, with its 10,000,000 of people, being substantially one-tenth of the population of this Republic, with its unlimited wealth and boundless resources, with its great liberality and its intense loyalty, yields to no other State in this Union.

The instance cited here that the Government contributed in building the great transcontinental railroads is not analogous and can not be applied to this bill. Those were great transcontinental railroads joining with links of steel other roads for extension across the continent, great inland arteries of commerce binding the States together into an indissoluble union. If the purpose before the House was to build a Federal road for the purposes of the Federal Government, I would not rise in my seat and object. If it were to build a great road across this continent for automobilists and tourists and purposes of general traffic, I would not rise to object. Even if it were to build a road between the States, joining great centers of population, where you might say it would serve the purposes of interstate commerce, I would not object. But that is not this bill. This bill is to provide for an indiscriminate building of roads in the States, the building of a road from some railroad station to some farmer's home. That is what it means.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAGEE. Can the gentleman from New York yield me five minutes more?

Mr. DUNN. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. MAGEE. And, Mr. Chairman, before I forget and conclude I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAGEE. Now, I do not believe, while I have not examined the question carefully from a legal standpoint, that the Federal Government has power under the Federal Constitution to build a road from a railroad station to some farmer's home.

There is no connection between this bill and the Post Office Department. There appears to be a sort of inference from this bill that ultimately it might improve rural post roads, but there is not anything that the Post Office Department or the Postmaster General has to do with the building of these roads. This is entirely clear, as shown by section 2 of the bill. The real purpose of the bill, in my judgment, is shown at the end of section 5, which provides for the building of private roads from railway stations to farmers' homes.

Again, this act, in my opinion, is not a workable act in the public interest, in that it fails to fix upon some authority an affirmative and imperative obligation to maintain a constructed road in a reasonably safe condition for public use.

The maintenance of a road is fully as important as the construction thereof. In the maintenance of a road in a reasonably safe condition for public travel it is not practicable, in my judgment, for a State highway department to submit to the Secretary of Agriculture surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of the cost of maintenance as a basis of agreement for the final determination as to what proportion of such cost the Secretary of Agriculture, in his discretion, will consent to pay. When a culvert or bridge or roadway needs repairs, public safety demands that such repairs shall be promptly made and that the responsibility therefor can not be shifted nor evaded. The primary responsibility to maintain a constructed road in a safe condition should be fixed and determined as a reasonable guaranty of prompt action by some duly constituted authority. When an act in reference to maintenance authorizes dickering as to cost and discretion as to action no practicable results in the public interest can, in my judgment, be attained thereunder.

Again you appropriate $25,000,000 a year, or authorize it. It is only a starter. Ten years from now, if you institute this form of paternalism, you will be asking for $250,000,000. There are 1,200,000 miles of rural post roads, as stated here yesterday, and about 2,000,000 miles of roads in the entire country. Why, what could you do with $25,000,000? If you deduct the amount deemed necessary for the administration of the act, say, $5,000,000—it does not make any difference whether you say one million or five million, but say $5,000,000—you will have twenty millions left; or, on all of the roads of the country an average of about $10 a mile, not enough to fill up the spring mudholes.

So when you talk about this building of roads as a method of preparing the Nation for national defense, why, I would like to ask you, if this is your plan of preparedness, how many centuries it would take to get the roads of this country in a condition for national defense? [Laughter.]

Now, I am for national defense. I think we ought to do something. I think we have a great Government here. I think that this Nation to-day, as in the days of old, is a Nation of patriots, as the world will see if the test shall ever come. Now, let us do something. Let us give our energy and our resources in solving wisely the serious problems confronting this Government. We want a strong modern Navy for national defense. [Applause on the Republican side.] A Navy, and a strong Navy, is the best safeguard for peace. We need a Navy deemed sufficient by our naval officers and experts to defend and uphold at any time or place the honor, the dignity, and the traditions of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DUNN. I yield two minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I will not take more than one minute. I simply want to say that I would not feel that I was worthy to be a Member of this House, Republican as I am, and I have even been called a black Republican, unless I could place loyalty above my party and the interests of my country above every other consideration, and I look into the faces of you gentlemen across the aisle and take you by the hand and say: Let us act together, let us work harmoniously, zealously, and earnestly in the performance of our duty in placing this great country of ours in a state of reasonable preparedness. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In my judgment we have a Government not only worth fighting for but worth dying for, and any American who is unwilling to fight for his country in her defense, and, if needs be, unwilling to die for his country in her defense is, in my judgment, unfit for American citizenship. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Has the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN] another speaker?

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS].

Mr. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I am aware of an unwritten rule which prevails in this body that a new Member should not with unseemly haste inject himself into the deliberations of the House and that he should not assume to take part in the discussion upon this floor until he has at least acquainted himself reasonably well with the rules and practices of the House. I do not find fault with this rule, as I believe its observance is alike beneficial to a new Member and to the House, and I do not wish to seem to violate even the spirit of this very sensible rule; but in view, Mr. Chairman, of the fact that I have the honor to be a member of the Committee on Roads, which has considered and reported this bill to the House, I have felt that I would be justified in making a few remarks in favor of its passage. [Applause.]

The legislation proposed in this bill is of very great importance to the whole country and is of vital interest to the people of the State of Illinois, and particularly to that section of the State which I have the honor to represent upon this floor.

The bill under consideration provides that the General Government shall extend aid to the various States in the construction and maintenance of public roads, applying particularly to post roads and roads over which the mails are carried by the Free Rural Delivery System.

By the terms of the bill an amount not exceeding $25,000,000 shall be appropriated annually and shall be disbursed by the Secretary of Agriculture. The amount apportioned to each State is to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture in the following manner: Sixty-five thousand dollars to each of the States and one-half of the remainder to each State in the ratio which the population of such State bears to the population of all the States as shown by the latest available Federal census, and the other half of such remainder in the ratio which the mileage of rural free delivery and star-mail routes in such State bears to the mileage of rural free delivery and star-mail routes of all the States as shown by the latest available report of the Postmaster General.

The bill is constructed upon the theory that public roads are local concerns and that it is primarily the duty of the States to provide them for their people. Jurisdiction over the roads is not sought to be disturbed by any provision of the pending bill, but is left where such jurisdiction now lies, with the several States. It is merely proposed to grant aid and assistance to the various States for the construction and maintenance of public roads, leaving the States free to build and construct their own public roads of whatever character they may desire and in their own way, subject, of course, to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture on each road where Federal aid is granted.

The plan adopted for the distribution of the aid to be granted to the various States is, in the judgment of the members of the committee, the most equitable and satisfactory of any suggested to the committee. No plan that was considered by the committee was wholly free from objections, but the plan finally adopted by which each State receives a minimum of $65,000 with its pro rata share of the balance of the fund based on population and miles of public road in each State, over which the mails are carried, appeared to be the most acceptable and workable of any considered by the committee.

Under this plan of distribution the State of Illinois will receive $1,372,330.

There is a very general and wide-spread demand throughout the country for legislation of this kind. The sentiment for Federal aid in the building and maintaining of our public roads is not confined alone to the residents of the rural communities, but exists among all classes of our people. Some of the most enthusiastic advocates of the proposition for Federal aid in road construction being large-minded and public-spirited professional and business men residing in the cities.

It has been urged against the enactment of legislation of this character, that an appropriation such as is contemplated in this bill can not constitutionally be made. This argument, however, is not seriously urged of late years, in view of the ever-expanding activities of the Federal Government, covering such exercise of power as the purchase of Louisiana and Alaska, and the immense and ever-recurring appropriations for the improvement of our harbors and interior rivers, for reclamation service, for educational work, and the many and varied activities of the Government in other fields.

The Constitution provides that the General Government may establish post offices and post roads, may regulate commerce between the several States, may provide for the common defense, and may do those things that promote the general welfare. This appropriation can be constitutionally made under that section of the Constitution giving the Congress the power to establish and maintain post roads, and upon the broad, general ground that the proposed legislation will promote the general welfare and provide for the common defense. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing that will conduce more to the general welfare of the whole country than the improvement of our country roads. Good roads are not only a necessity and an inestimable blessing to the residents of the rural communities but are a powerful factor in the growth, development, and prosperity of every section of our common country. From an economic standpoint, the problem of good roads is not surpassed in importance by any other subject now before the American Congress. The problem of transportation goes to the very foundation of the development and prosperity of any nation. Better, cheaper, and additional transportation facilities in the United States must benefit every inhabitant and result in more development and greater productiveness of our natural resources, meaning more and cheaper food and necessities of life.

All the great nations of the past of which history gives any account were builders of great systems of public roads. The histories of ancient Egypt, of Babylon, and of Rome tell us of the building and construction of great public roads by those historic and powerful peoples. These roads were used in the transportation of goods and merchandise in times of peace and for the use of great armies in times of war. When Rome was at the height of her glory under the reign of Augustus Cæsar, 29 great military roads, reaching every part of that great world Empire, radiated from the capital city. It is estimated that at that time the total mileage of improved roads in the Roman Empire was at least 50,000 miles. Many of these roads remained in fair repair for centuries, and long after the star of Roman greatness had ceased to shine in the firmament of nations these roads remained a monument to Roman power and achievement. [Applause.]

The greatest and most lasting exhibition of the genius of the first Napoleon was the magnificent system of public roads he gave to France. These roads constructed by Napoleon have been improved and kept in repair by the Government of France, and it was due to their splendid condition that the rapid and easy mobilization of the armies of France and their speedy transportation to points was made possible at the outbreak of the present war in August, 1914.

The inestimable benefit of a system of highly improved public roads in time of war was demonstrated in the most striking manner in the instance just cited. France was absolutely saved from destruction by her thoroughly adequate and highly improved system of public roads.

In the contest between the armies of Germany and Russia along the eastern front of the present great war in Europe the part played by a system of good roads in war has also been most forcibly demonstrated. Germany, with her admirable system of improved public roads connecting every part of the Empire, has been able to handle her troops, shifting them to and from different fronts, at a very great and telling advantage over Russia, whose public roads, from the best information I can gather, are very similar and in about the same condition as the public roads in the United States.

When the history of the present war in Europe is finally written it will be seen that there has been no more important factor in the whole conflict than the transportation facilities of the various nations over their public roads. I would not at all be surprised if it should be the verdict of impartial history that this was the most important, if not the determining, factor of the whole war.

So, Mr. Chairman, at this grave crisis in the history of the country, when our people are thinking and talking so much about "preparedness" and the "national defense," the Congress can not afford to ignore the important factor that a system of good roads will be in any comprehensive plan of defense that may be considered.

The money that we spend at this time and in the future in developing a system of good roads throughout the Republic will prove to be of the greatest value as a means of defense in time of war, should that sad day ever come. It will not only be a bulwark in time of war but will add greatly to our prosperity, growth, and happiness in time of peace.

It must be admitted that in the building of public roads the American people have not kept pace with their splendid progress along almost every other line of growth and development. We have the greatest and most efficient railroad system in the world, a system that in most of the States reaches almost every important center, and in many places reaches every nook and corner of the State. The several States and the General Government for decades have encouraged the building and extension of our railroads, and in many instances have rendered the railroads great assistance by giving to them large and valuable portions of the public domain and by subsidies and concessions of one kind and another.

The development of our magnificent system of railroads has been one of the main factors in the marvelous growth and prosperity of the country, and no one seriously questions the wisdom of the policy that has lent the aid and encouragement of the General Government and of many of the States to this great work.

While we have been doing this the Government has almost entirely overlooked the very important duty of encouraging and assisting in the building of the public roads of the country. This highly important duty should now be recognized and assumed by the Federal Government.

The farmers of the country are unanimously in favor of the legislation proposed in this bill. They feel, and justly so, that the cost of building and maintaining a system of improved roads throughout the rural districts is too great a burden to be carried by them alone. They believe also that, inasmuch as the public roads belong to and are used by all the people of the country, the general public should bear a reasonable proportion of the great burden of their building and cost of maintenance.

If a public road running past the home of a farmer belonged to him personally, or if it was constructed for his own exclusive use and benefit, there might be some logic to the argument that it is his duty to build and maintain the same. If the highways of a given community in a rural district belonged exclusively to those who live in that particular community and if they had the exclusive right to the use of them, it might with some force be contended that the general public should not be called upon to assist in the cost of building and keeping in repair such highways. But such is not the case. A public road is such in fact as well as in name, and every citizen of the country has a legal right to its free and unrestricted use.

The country roads belong to all the people.

Until recently the whole problem of building country roads has been considered a local problem and a local burden for each separate rural community to work out for itself, and as a consequence of this neglect and this shortsighted policy on the part of the Federal Government and of the States there has been comparatively little progress in permanent road building in many of the States. This neglect has operated to the very great injury of the rural sections and has hindered and delayed the proper growth and development of those sections more than any other one thing.

Recognizing that the making of country roads was more than a local problem for each of the many thousands of rural communities to solve each for itself, there has been in recent years legislation in most of the States establishing State highway commissions, and in many of the States legislation has been enacted providing State aid to the local subdivisions in the construction of permanent good roads. In some of the States where State aid is not granted the State highway commissions, however, are granted powers authorizing them to work in harmony and conjointly with county or local road officials in some general scheme or system of road building and road improvement.

Legislation of this character in the various States has proven very beneficial in stimulating a widespread interest for better roads. It has also resulted in many States in considerable progress being made and much work actually being done in the construction of improved roads.

State aid has naturally led to a more insistent demand for aid of the Federal Government, and this sentiment for Federal aid has now grown until it is, as I said before, widespread, and there is nothing this Congress can do in the way of general legislation and that will prove as popular with the people or that will be as far-reaching in the benefits it will bring to the whole country as to pass this bill and enter upon the policy of national aid in the construction of country roads.

This policy, if adopted now, will not be changed nor receded from in the years to come. Future Congresses will improve upon this legislation, and the amount appropriated will grow from year to year, and the various States and the local subdivisions of the States, encouraged and stimulated by the generous aid and encouragement of the Federal Government, will take up this great work in earnest and carry it forward until all the main roads in every rural section of America become improved roads, and this great network of improved country roads will radiate from every city in the Union to every country village and rural community, and our rural population will be able to avail themselves of every advantage of city life and the people of the cities and villages can readily avail themselves of all the benefits and all the pleasures of close and easy contact with the wholesome influences of country life.

Mr. Chairman, the Government of the United States uses every day in the year 1,200,000 miles of country roads in the carrying of its mails by the star route and the Rural Delivery System. The Government certainly owes some obligations toward the upkeep and construction of this 1,200,000 miles of public roads that it uses daily. No one, it seems to me, can seriously contend otherwise.

In presenting this bill to the House, the chairman of the committee, Mr. SHACKLEFORD, says in his report:

> To carry and deliver the mail is a function of the Federal Government, and it is its duty to provide itself with the facilities necessary to a proper performance of this function, such as postmasters, post offices, and post roads. A post road is just as truly a postal facility as is a post office. As in most rural communities it has been found less expensive and more expedient to rent post offices than to build them, so it would be less expensive and more expedient to use the roads of the States as post roads than it would be to construct and maintain an independent system. In such cases it would seem but just that the General Government should make some contribution to the construction and maintenance of the roads which it uses.
> In times past, when the volume and weight of the postal matter were negligible, the interests of the General Government in the roads were not substantial, but with the advent of rural free delivery came a Federal necessity for better roads, and with the now rapidly expanding parcel post that necessity has become acute.

The language of this report sums up in a nutshell the duty of the Government in regard to post roads, and to me it appears unanswerable. It is just as reasonable and just as logical to contend that the cost of the erection of a Federal building to be used as a post office in a city should be borne by the citizens who happen to live in that city as it is to say that the whole cost of the burden of making and maintaining public roads over which the mail of the Government is carried in the country should be borne by the farmers who happen to live along those roads.

The absurdity of the former proposition is apparent at first blush and the latter will appear equally so when it is once considered. No one would think or say that the citizens of New York, Chicago, San Francisco, or even any of our smaller cities, should, at their own expense, put up the necessary buildings and furnish all the facilities for handling the mails in such cities.

Should the farmer, then, be required to bear all the burden in building and maintaining the public roads over which the Government carries its mails into the rural districts? To single the farmers out as the one class that Uncle Sam requires to bear this burden looks like discrimination. It is discrimination gainst the 45,000,000 of our population who live in the country. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the farmers pay a very large part of the revenues of the Government that go into the Federal Treasury—a larger part in proportion to their wealth than any other class of our citizens. They have received in return from the Federal Government in the way of appropriations for their benefit less than any other class. Uncomplainingly, year after year and decade after decade, they have seen their millions go through Federal appropriations to the aid of rivers and harbors, for the erection of great and imposing public buildings in all our cities, for expensive and elaborate coast defenses for the citizens living along the seaboard, and for a thousand other purposes.

Not only have they borne a large part of the burdens of Government in taxation, receiving very little, if anything, directly in return, but in times of war they have unstintingly given to the Nation their sturdy sons, who have loyally defended the flag on land and sea. [Applause.] I heartily concur in the sentiments expressed by my friend from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], when replying to the criticism made against this bill, that it was special legislation in the interest of the farmers, he said:

> I do not admit that the statement is true; but if it were, it would not be for an unworthy or ignoble purpose.

Why should Congress not legislate for the farmers after all these years of neglect and discrimination against them, especially when the legislation desired will not only benefit the farmers as a class, but will also, at the same time, bring untold benefits and happiness to all classes of our people.

The Free Rural Delivery System will no doubt be extended in the future. It can not be stated with absolute accuracy just how many people are served daily by the Rural Delivery Mail Service, but it is safe to say that it is well upward of 25,000,000.

The establishment of the Free Rural Mail Service was the first act of legislation by the Federal Government that was a direct benefit to the farmers as a class. That it has been of inestimable benefit can not be denied. This service has not only benefited the farmer but it has also at the same time benefited the whole country. It is a very useful and a very popular service. Any act of Congress that will tend to make more efficient this service or to extend its untold benefits will meet the hearty approval of the farmers of the country.

And, Mr. Chairman, any act of legislation here that will benefit the great agricultural classes of the United States will be a benefit to every other class of our people and to the whole country.

It is marvelous what free rural mail delivery has done for the rural districts of the United States. Although this great system has been established and developed largely within the last dozen years, its influence in the development and progress of the agricultural communities has been wonderful.

In many sections of the country it has completely changed country life.

To-day 45,000 rural mail carriers, in round numbers, are daily delivering to farmers of America at their front doors the great metropolitan daily newspapers, the best magazines and literary publications of the country, and first-class mail matter many times double in volume that received by them before the institution of this service.

The educational value of this service to the farming communities is incalculable. I remember very well in the country community where I was reared when but a single city newspaper came to the local post office. It was a weekly publication, and I can well remember how almost that entire neighborhood depended upon the substantial old farmer who enjoyed the luxury of a weekly newspaper for their information about current events.

A daily newspaper or a high-class magazine was a thing unknown in that community. That community was not any different from the average country community of that day.

That has not been so many years ago, and yet there has been a wonderful transformation in that neighborhood. Three rural mail routes now deliver mail to the citizens residing in that township. One of the carriers told me he delivered on his route alone 56 daily newspapers, several weekly and monthly publications, including church papers, farm journals, and magazines; that almost every one of his patrons took one of the local county papers, and many of them two or three. I have no doubt that he also delivered daily more letters and first-class mail than the entire community received at the local post office in a week 15 years ago.

The change that has taken place in conditions in that community has taken place in the 45,000 other rural communities scattered throughout the length and breadth of these 48 States.

In addition to this we now have the parcel post, which has enhanced the value of this service manyfold. The volume of business now transacted through the parcel post is enormous and is growing, and will continue to grow by leaps and bounds in the future. A very large per cent of all the parcel-post business is handled by the rural mail carriers. It is now a great source of revenue to the Government and will be greater as the years go by.

The installation of the free rural mail-delivery system on more than 1,000,000 miles of country roads certainly creates, on the part of the Government, a very vital interest in the question of roads, and also lays upon the Government the sacred duty of contributing at least its just and equitable part in improving and maintaining these roads.

The enactment of the present bill into law commits the Government to this policy. I submit, Mr. Chairman, it is a wise, a just, and a patriotic policy, one that necessarily follows the adoption of the policy of free rural mail delivery and a policy that will bring a greater measure of good to the whole country than any act of legislation in recent years.

It will certainly be an act of belated justice to our great farming population, who have contributed so much toward the development, the greatness, and the prosperity of the Republic.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, the position taken in opposition to this bill by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who is our colleague upon the Committee on Roads. The doctrine announced by him upon this floor, that in legislating upon great questions of national concern we are not to look beyond the borders of our own State to consider the general good of all the people of the Nation, is, to say the least, a strange doctrine to come out of the historic old State of Massachusetts.

It was a great son of this splendid Commonwealth who more than any other of our statesmen taught the American people to think in national terms. His clear and patriotic vision reached far beyond the boundaries of his much-beloved Massachusetts in considering questions of national import. His patriotic, prophetic, matchless words, "Liberty and union, one and inseparable, now and forever," uttered upon a memorable occasion have become the national watchword in Federal legislation and is the rock upon which those of us who support this and kindred measures base our argument in support of the proposition that the power and duty of Congress are commensurate with the requirements of the national welfare. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, there is no question of greater interest to the people of the United States, my State, and district than that of good roads, which is sufficient justification for my taking the time of the House for a few minutes. Everyone recognizes the importance of good roads. This question more nearly affects every citizen of the United States than perhaps any other bill pending or which may be introduced in this session of Congress.

In the first place, there are, in round numbers, about 6,500,000 farmers in the United States, according to the last census, and, including women and children, there are about 45,000,000 depending upon them. Everyone who owns a farm is deeply interested in this question, because a good road running by a farm, connecting it with a market or railroad station, greatly enhances the value of the land. The owner of the farm and those dependent upon him are not alone in being interested in this subject, but the tenants who live upon farms are also interested, because statistics show it costs 25 cents per ton per mile to transport farm products to market in the United States, while in continental Europe, where they have good roads, it costs but 8 cents per ton per mile, a loss to the farmer on account of bad roads of 17 cents per ton per mile.

I saw it stated in a newspaper not long ago that it costs a farmer more to haul a bushel of wheat 9½ miles from his farm to a railroad station, over the average road, such as we have in the United States, than it costs to ship a bushel of wheat from New York to Liverpool, a distance of 3,000 miles.

It is estimated that the railroads carry annually about 900,000,000 tons of freight and that at least 200,000,000 tons are hauled over the country roads to market, wharves, or railroad stations for shipment. It can be readily seen, therefore, what a great loss the farmers of the country sustain by reason of bad roads throughout the country.

The Department of Agriculture is doing a great work in collecting data and publishing bulletins, inviting attention to the great economic value of good roads, educating the people throughout the country how to build them, and stimulating the farmers themselves to take greater interest in this movement for bettering the roads of the country.

There are in the United States about 2,250,000 miles of roads, and to improve them all is a gigantic task. We have to begin somewhere. It is true that it will take years to build them, but the building of good roads means more to the rural community than the time and money saved in transporting farm products to market. Good roads mean better schoolhouses, increased attendance at school, more "moonlight schools," and less illiteracy. [Applause.] They mean more churches and a larger attendance upon Sunday schools and church services; they mean combined country high schools.

Good roads make it possible to extend the Rural Mail Service to the door of every farmer throughout the United States, carrying the daily mail to him and enabling him to take daily papers, and bringing to him the same mail advantages enjoyed by those living in cities and towns.

Good roads by bringing these comforts and conveniences to the rural population will have a tendency to stop the farmer's boy and girl from desiring to remove to town, and will greatly stimulate the "back to the country movement." We who were reared upon the farm believe that this will greatly strengthen the citizenship of the United States.

The people who own the farms and make their living direct from farming are not alone in being interested in this subject, as laborers, carpenters, professional men, bankers, merchants, and, in fact, everyone who resides in cities and towns are also deeply interested in the question of good roads.

In my State of Oklahoma the merchants, bankers, and professional men take the lead in every good-road movement. They are always at the head of petitions for improving roads leading into the towns in which they live, subscribing money to buy material, and on road-working days close up their places of business to help build them. They appreciate that as the farmers are made more prosperous they have more money to pay bills, more money to buy clothing, more money to deposit in banks, and more money with which to build better houses and barns, which will require more lumber and hardware and the services of carpenters, and that they will invest more money in live stock. In other words, as they become more prosperous they will add to the general prosperity of the entire country. Hence in considering this question to-day our vision should be broader than looking at the question from a selfish standpoint, and we should appreciate the great importance that stimulating road building is to the entire citizenship of this Republic.

I have often thought that if the farmers of the country were educated to better farming and marketing methods, had the advantages of Rural Mail Service and good roads over which to transport their farm products to market, we could little dream of the wonderful prosperity that would come to them and the entire country within the next decade.

I am not on the committee which reported this bill, but no man in this House is in deeper sympathy with the question of good roads than I am. I have not the time now to critically analyze it. However, it provides that the building of good roads may be assisted by the Federal Government to the amount of not more than $25,000,000 for any fiscal year, to be expended in the following manner:

Sixty-five thousand dollars to each State, and one-half of the remainder in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the population of all the States, and the other half in the ratio which the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes of each State bears to the total mileage of all the States.

I am not so sure that the bill is specific enough. Perhaps it should be more specific, but I want to say to the House that although this bill may not be the best bill that could be written, and it may be imperfect as to the details in some or many particulars, yet this or any other bill which has for its purpose aiding and stimulating the people in the building of good roads will have my unqualified support.

On January 12 I introduced a bill upon the same subject—H. R. 8819. It provides an appropriation of $25,000,000 annually, divides the roads up into four classes, and authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to expend a certain sum per mile upon each class of road.

There are three views with reference to road building in the United States: The first, I might say, is opposed to any Government aid whatsoever; the second wants great highways built across the country connecting capitals, important cities and towns; and the third class, to which I belong, believes that the money should be used to aid and stimulate the farmers of the country to appreciate the importance and necessity of building good roads from the farms to the markets.

The bill which I drew gave every civil subdivision in each State of the United States the option of using a pro rata part of the money appropriated by the Federal Government.

The bill under consideration, as I construe it, leaves this question to the State highway commissioner of each State. I think it ought to be so written in the law that no favoritism whatever could be shown, either by the Federal or State authorities, against the weaker citizens of this country.

What I would like to guard against is making it possible for any State authority to discriminate in favor of the larger highways and against the less influential citizens of the country.

The bill introduced by me contains a provision giving each civil subdivision the right to its share of the money, conditioned that at least an equal amount should be made available for the same purpose, and that in the event any civil subdivision did not avail itself of the money to which it was entitled, then the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to expend all of the money to which said civil subdivision of any State was entitled upon the larger highways of that State, if the subdivisions through which said highways ran should make an equal amount of money available for the same purpose.

In the bill under consideration the State of Oklahoma will receive $532,138 if it becomes a law. It would receive about an equal sum under the terms of the bill introduced by me.

I am glad to know that doubt no longer exists as to the constitutional power of the General Government to lend its financial aid in the construction and maintenance of good roads.

While, of course, I would not do violence to the Constitution of my country, but if its constitutionality had not already been tested, and I entertained a reasonable doubt about it, I would resolve that doubt in favor of the bill and permit the Supreme Court to finally pass upon the question.

The State of Oklahoma, anticipating that this or similar legislation might be enacted by Congress, on March 15, 1915, passed a comprehensive road law creating a department of highways and providing for the appointment of a commissioner of highways and defining his duties in detail. Among his other duties it is provided that he should—

> Fifth. To cooperate with the Federal Government in all matters pertaining to the improvement of public highways, and all funds provided by Congress and appropriated for the improvement of the public highways in this State shall be expended under the supervision of the commissioner of highways.

It authorizes the commissioner of highways to appoint a State engineer—

> Who shall be a civil engineer of established reputation and qualified in road and bridge construction.

It also provides for the appointment of county engineers, and requires that they shall have a practical knowledge of civil engineering and of road building, and that no person shall be elected or appointed to this position who does not hold a certificate from the State highway commissioner or who has not stood the examination required by his department.

The act is a very comprehensive one, providing for cooperation between the State highway commissioner, the county engineers, and the county commissioners, and for designating, laying out, and the platting of a complete system of roads in every county throughout the State. It also provides a means of State and county taxation of one-fourth of 1 mill ad valorem, as well as a tax of 50 cents per horsepower on each automobile.

I cite this to show that our new State is alive to the great importance of this question and will gladly welcome the enactment of this legislation by Congress.

Oklahoma is peculiarly interested in this legislation, because of the fact that the eastern half of the State was formerly occupied by the Five Civilized Tribes, and when these tribal lands were allotted a large part of them were made nontaxable either by agreement or by acts of Congress.

But this bill, Mr. Chairman, has more in it than the financial assistance we extend to farmers and more than stimulating the farmers in good road building; it will do more than give better school facilities, more than increase the attendance upon Sunday schools and churches, and greatly improve the Rural Mail Service. Over and above all it will restore confidence to the farmers of this country and bring them to realize that their Representatives in Congress have their welfare at heart, and that while the farmers of the country bear so much of the burdens of this Government in the way of taxation, Congress is ready and willing to give them recognition and to give them some of the benefits of this Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that when I heard the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] talking about the Cumberland Road and then gritting his teeth and opposing this bill because it was unconstitutional, I remembered when that road was being built. Thomas Jefferson was President of the United States and a man by the name of Hodge was attorney general in Pennsylvania, and Pennsylvania undertook to dictate where the road should go or veto its right to go through the State. And Thomas Jefferson sent a message saying he was willing to recognize counsel of Pennsylvania as to where it should go, but the right to go through every State and any State was a governmental right that he would not yield. So if there was nothing else in the Constitution on this road question, I would much rather risk Thomas Jefferson than the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to say that every State through which that road passed gave its consent.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Sure. It had to, because Thomas Jefferson notified them it was going on, anyhow. And so the question of constitutionality is lodged upon the proposition that the Constitution says Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads. That word "establish" has been construed in divers decisions to give Congress the right to build roads, build post offices, buy mail sacks, make contracts, and ten thousand—yea, a million—other things, under the one word "establish." And we build thousands of post offices all over this Republic under that one word "establish." And the same word "establish" that gives the right to build a post office gives the right to build post roads—governs both in the same proposition.

Then the next point of constitutionality is founded upon the fact that they say it is under the general-welfare clause. I have never been a stickler for the general-welfare clause, but I can find thousands of very munificent and splendid institutions in this Republic that had no other method of getting in. For instance, I challenge the gentleman, who is such a stickler for constitutionality, to find me one sentence in the Constitution that authorizes Cincinnati to have a national bank. I challenge any man to do it. And in the constitutional convention, when the power to create a corporation was up for discussion, they voted it down three times, and Mr. Morris of Pennsylvania said the reason they voted it down was because they were afraid somebody would establish a bank.

But I am going to get back to my friend from New York [Mr. MAGEE]. He is gone. I wanted to say something. I was amused when that exuberant, volatile, good-looking fellow got through with his speech. I really was. He looked over to our side of the House and said he did not consider that the whole ballasting power that held the ship of state properly poised was on that side of the House. And I agreed with him. And I decided that I would watch hereafter, and if it takes a massive, ponderous brain to balance the ship of state we will have to keep our side pretty well filled up to hold his side level. He wound up by saying that he was not opposing this matter so much on its merits, but was wanting to save the whole financial appropriation business to put into a lot of big gunboats and an imperial standing Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, this seems to be quite a field day for the freshmen. Quite a number of new Members are plunging in this afternoon, and it is well enough to give them an opportunity to be heard.

I was somewhat disappointed by the speech of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE]. I speak with respect of him and of his great State. But the doctrine which he enunciated if applied to the South would be considered by us an unfortunate one, and would be considered by many citizens of New York as an unfortunate doctrine. The gentleman used the expression that New York ought not to be mulcted in the sum of $3,000,000 for the purpose of building up highways thousands of miles from New York. If we applied that doctrine to Arkansas, to the Southern States, where the negro population is large, we would be criticized by the gentleman from New York, and properly so. Down in our country, down in the South, the negroes unfortunately pay but little tax, pay but a small school tax; and yet, whenever an effort is made by a southern legislator to segregate the taxes paid by the white people for the benefit of white schools only, Democratic legislatures always vote such measures down overwhelmingly.

You ought not to despise States because they are small or because they are poor. The starry heavens are more beautiful because the little stars shine there along with the big stars, and no one would want to blot out a star because, though it is bright, it is small, and because there are larger and more brilliant constellations.

New York has received much at the hands of the Federal Government, as have other States whose Representatives criticize this measure. Millions of dollars have been expended all over the country by pouring into streams that are dry half the year millions of dollars and by pouring millions of dollars into harbors that are never whitened by the sail of a ship or blackened by the smoke of a steamer; and now, when the country asks for a meager appropriation for good roads for the purpose of building up the whole country, we find gentlemen in the larger States, where millions of Federal money have been wasted as above stated, raising the question that they ought not to be required to spend more money than can be used in their own bailiwicks or in their own sections.

This is by far the most important bill that has been considered by this Congress, or that will be considered by the present Congress. More people are interested in this measure and more people desire its speedy passage. My only objection to this bill is that it does not go far enough.

I introduced a road bill, H. R. 479, on the first day of the session that was considered too radical by the committee, perhaps, asking for $1,000,000 for each State annually until $1,000,000,000 should be consumed in road building. Such a measure as that would furnish employment for the unemployed and would bring happiness and prosperity to all the people. I know of nothing so important to the country as the bill I had the honor to introduce. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to be allowed to insert the bill in the RECORD. It is not lengthy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to insert the bill named by him in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the bill referred to:

A bill (H. R. 479) to provide for Federal aid to good roads, to aid the States in maintenance of roads, and to create a national highway commission.

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to establish, improve, and maintain public roads that are now or may hereafter be needed for use as post roads, military roads, or for interstate commerce, there be, and hereby is, created a fund to be known as the United States highway fund. Said fund shall be raised in the manner herein provided, but the Treasurer of the United States is hereby authorized to receive and place to the credit of said fund any money that may be contributed from other sources and to expend the same upon the order of the United States highway commission or in accordance with the conditions of the contribution.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of providing money for the United States highway fund the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue and sell on and after January 1, 1918, at par, with accrued interest, coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, in denominations of $20, or multiples of that sum, said bonds to be payable in coin 50 years from the date of issue and to bear interest payable in coin semiannually at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, the total amount of said bonds not to exceed $1,000,000,000, and the issue and sale of same not to exceed such amounts as may be necessary from time to time to enable the Treasurer of the United States to make payments of salaries of officers, agents, engineers, and employees, and for expenditures in the preliminary work and in the work of laying out, construction, repairs, and maintenance of the highways to be built under the provisions of this act. Bonds issued under the authority of this act, or the income therefrom, shall not be subject to taxation of any kind for any purpose. Bonds authorized by this section shall be first offered at par as a popular loan under such regulations, prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, as will give opportunity to the citizens of the United States to participate in the subscriptions to such loans, and in allotting such bonds the several subscriptions of individuals shall be first accepted, and the subscriptions for the lowest amounts shall be first allotted. Any portion of any issue of said bonds not subscribed for as above provided may be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury at not less than par, under such regulations as he may prescribe, but no commissions shall be allowed or paid thereon; and a sum not exceeding one twenty-fifth of 1 per cent of the amount of the bonds herein authorized is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expense of preparing, advertising, and issuing the same.

SEC. 3. That as soon as practicable after January 1, 1918, the sum of $1,000,000 shall be expended annually in each State under the direction of the United States highway commission, hereinafter constituted, without regard to population, taxable property, or extent of territory in said States, in the construction, maintenance, and extension of public roads as before mentioned and for the purposes before mentioned, and such construction, maintenance, and extension shall be continued until the fund above provided for shall be exhausted.

SEC. 4. That there is hereby created a United States highway commission, to carry out the provisions of this act, to be composed of competent experts in road building, four of whom shall be selected by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and three members from each State to be appointed by the governor and confirmed by the highest legislative body of said State, the first four members acting with the last-mentioned members to constitute the United States highway commission for the different States respectively. Each of the first four named commissioners shall receive as salary the sum of $10,000 annually, and the last-named commissioners to receive $5,000 annually, each commissioner to receive his necessary expenses when traveling in the performance of his duty as such commissioner. Members of the commission shall give bond for the faithful performance of their duties in whatever sum the Secretary of the Treasury shall require.

SEC. 5. The four members of the United States highway commission first mentioned in this act shall have power to make all needful rules for the proper administration of this act, the payment of salaries, expenses, for materials, labor, and the safeguarding of all funds under its control, and shall be empowered to employ and fix the salaries of all clerks, engineers, and employees.

SEC. 6. Said commission shall have its head office in the District of Columbia, but shall maintain one public highway division in and for each State where the local members of said commission shall have their offices. Said commission may require the assistance and cooperation of the officers and employees of any department in its work.

SEC. 7. That before any State shall receive the benefits of this act, the legislature of said State shall assent to the provisions of this act by resolution duly passed and approved by governor of the State.

SEC. 8. That said highway commission shall, as far as practicable, construct the roads contemplated in this act so as to serve and benefit the people of each State fairly and equitably and without unjust discrimination, and said work shall be carried on in each State simultaneously.

SEC. 9. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. TILLMAN. I prefer my own bill to any other, but I am willing and anxious to vote for the pending bill or for any other bill that proposes to build up the great highways of the country. I prefer good roads to giant navies or to mighty armies.

Mr. Chairman, the dirt road is used by the farmer a hundred times where the railroad is used by him once. As was stated here by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS], all the great nations of the world have been road builders. The greater the nation, the greater road builder it has been, and these roads have been built by public moneys; by moneys taken out of the national treasury.

Highways range from the narrow path made by the savage to the graded turnpike. Highway history is both interesting and instructive. The Athenian senate bestowed much care upon good roads. The Carthaginians were good road builders. In Peru the Incas built lasting highways, the remains of which attest their magnificence and advanced civilization. The road from Quito to Cuzco, in Peru, was 2,000 miles in length, 20 feet wide, paved with stones 10 feet square, and had a running stream and shade trees on each side. The great highway leading from Babylon to ancient Memphis was paved at an early date, and along this road rose the cities of Nineveh, Tyre, Damascus, and Antioch.

In 312 B. C. Appius Claudius, a Roman patrician, became censor of the Roman Commonwealth and gained enduring fame by beginning, in 313, the construction of a remarkable road, which was named the Appian Way. It has been called the "queen of highways." The width of this road varied from 15 to 18 feet, and the method of construction was as follows: A trench was excavated the entire length and breadth of the roadway. In the trench the road materials were placed in four layers, having a thickness of 3 feet. The first layer consisted of large flat stones laid in lime mortar. The second was composed of broken stone mixed with one-third their quantity of lime, packed and made solid by ramming. The third layer was made of a mixture of broken brick, tiles, gravel, and lime, and the top pavement was a layer of regularly shaped stones about 6 inches thick, closely jointed and fitted with the utmost nicety. This road was eminently durable, but the poet Horace, who wrote concerning it, states that it was fatiguing to travel over it slowly. This road led direct from the gates of Rome to Capua, and was finally extended to Brundusium, 350 miles from the imperial city. It commands a beautiful prospect, embracing Campania, while on both sides of this great highway are numerous tombs, among which are the tombs of the Scipios.

The greatest of the Cæsars, the princely Julius, traveled over this "queen of roads," as did Cæsar Augustus and the war-lord Trajan, as did Marcus Brutus and the golden-lipped Cicero, as did the fascinating Cleopatra and the soldier-orator Marc Antony, and the greatest man of the ancient world, St. Paul himself, traveled with bare feet along this same Appian Way when he visited the wonderful city of the Cæsars.

To-day this durable road, long after the death of the blue-blooded Claudius, is in good repair, and now the swift and noiseless motor car glides gracefully over its dustless surface, pressing the same stones that felt the martial tread of great Pompey's legions more than 20 centuries ago. Rome built many other highways and became great by the help of these roads, which were built with money taken from the public treasury. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] is recognized.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to make any elaborate speech on this bill; in fact, I could not do so within the time allotted me by the chairman of the committee. Its merits are so manifest, however, that it furnishes its own defense. I do not think that there will be a more important—perhaps I should modify that by saying a more meritorious—bill come before this Congress than the one that we are now considering. I want to see this bill passed, and I hope that the Committee on Appropriations, after it is passed, will see its way clear to bring in a bill appropriating the amount of money authorized by this bill and that the good work will start. It does not take a student of affairs to see that the question of improved highways is one of ever-growing importance. A study of the historical feature of this interesting subject is not without its value in this connection, and in reading data on the subject in the Library of Congress I find:

HISTORICAL DATA.

The first American road law was passed by the General Assembly of Virginia in 1632, and the first American road built by white men was at Jamestown a few years later; in New England the path between Boston and Plymouth was begun in 1639; in the province of New York laws for road building were passed in 1664; two years later the first Maryland road law came into existence; and Pennsylvania followed in 1692 with a road act, placing the control of highways in the hands of townships, and this State is credited with the first important macadam road built in America—the Lancaster Turnpike, from Lancaster to Philadelphia—which was constructed in 1794.

The earliest authentic record of permanent roads is found in Egypt. A little to the east of the great Pyramids were discovered the remains of the giant causeway more than a mile in length. This is supposed to be a portion of the great highway built by King Cheops for the purpose of affording a passage across the sand for the transportation of the stone used in the construction of the great Pyramids. This is doubtless the road on which Herodotus tells us the great king employed 100,000 men for a period of 10 years. It was built of massive stone blocks 10 feet thick and was skirted on each side with mausoleums, temples, porticos, and statues.

The Persians probably learned the art of road building from the Babylonians, who built the first stone bridges and constructed a system of military roads throughout their Empire. There were two branches of a great road leading from Babylon to Syria, and historians say that a moderate toll was exacted.

The Romans were the first systematic road builders of the world. The first of their great roads was constructed from Rome to Capua, a distance of 142 Italian miles, by Claudius Appius, about 312 B. C., and is known as the Appian Way, or "The Queen of the Roads." This road was later extended to Brundisium, about 360 miles, and was probably completed by Julius Cæsar. About 220 B. C. the Flaminian Way was built. This road is of great interest because of its stone arch bridge across the River Nar, 60 miles from Rome. The central arch had a span of 150 feet and a rise of 100 feet, and has been pronounced the stateliest ruin in Italy. After the completion of the Flaminian Way, road building progressed rapidly until Rome reached the height of her glory, when there were 29 great military roads centering in the city. They represented the visible efforts of a nation for the preservation and extension of her national glory. The majority of the main Roman highways were built by contract at public expense. They were maintained in part by labor of soldiers and convicts or slaves, or by enforced service, which, in some instances, took the form of taxation. The supervision of the roads was intrusted to men of the highest rank. Augustus himself seems to have made those about Rome his special care. Crossroads were placed in charge of the local magistrates, although occasionally portions of the road were assigned to some landowner to maintain at his own cost.

The present road system of France, which is perhaps the finest in the world, was founded by Napoleon. He built many roads through the Empire, among them the road over the Simplon Pass, which was commenced in 1800 and required six years for completion. It was under him that the work was systematized and placed in the hands of a permanent body of engineers. In 1775 Tresaguet, a French engineer, published a treatise on broken-stone roads. His work preceded that of Macadam and Telford by about 40 years.

The first record of road legislation in England goes back as far as 1285, and it provides that the trees and bushes on both sides of all roads for a distance of 200 feet shall be cut away to prevent robbers from lurking therein and rushing upon victims unawares. In 1346 Edward III authorized the first toll to be levied for the repair of roads. This commission was granted to the master of the Hospital of St. Giles and to John Holborn, authorizing them to levy toll on vehicles passing on the roads leading from the hospital to the old Temple of London, and also on an adjoining road called the Portal. In 1523 Parliament passed its first act relative to the repair of roads; but it was not until the middle of the eighteenth century that highway legislation became active.

RECENT ACTIVITY.

This activity has grown with the passing years, and more so in recent years than ever before. In fact, nearly every State of the Union is actively aroused to the need of good roads and is making large expenditures for that purpose, either in the way of State appropriation or by means of local taxation. A study of the figures for the year ending December 31, 1914, will clearly display this activity. For the whole United States there was expended for the year 1914, by State funds, local funds, and joint funds, the total sum of $249,055,067. Every State in the Union was engaged in some degree in this good work. Some of the larger expenditures were: New York, $29,890,473; California, $14,670,614; Indiana, $13,258,761; Iowa, $11,437,000; Ohio, $11,261,882; Pennsylvania, $10,424,580; Michigan, $9,516,224; Wisconsin, $9,118,708; Texas, $8,750,000; and so on down the line, every State being actively alive to the importance of improved highways.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, as I have said, there has never been a time in American history when our people have been so keenly sensible to the importance of this internal improvement than to-day, and I think we have reached that point where the Federal Government should lend its aid; not in any sense to relieve the States and their localities of their duty and responsibility in the matter, but to supplement their good work by cooperation and intelligent assistance.

Section 8 of Article I of the Federal Constitution provides that Congress, among other things, shall have the power to "establish post offices and post roads"; and it is, therefore, not only within the power of the National Government to do so, but it is its manifest duty to do it.

NATIONAL AID.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party in its platform at Baltimore in 1912 had the following to say on this important question:

We favor national aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

And the Progressive Party in its platform adopted at Chicago June, 1912, said:

We recognize the vital importance of good roads and we pledge our party to foster their extension in every proper way, and we favor the early construction of national highways.

And the Socialist Party in their national convention in 1912 went on record in specific terms as favoring national aid to the development of highways and waterways system.

But the Republican platform, so far as I have been able to find, was silent on this important question; and no wonder that it fell from an electoral vote of 321 in 1908 to an electoral vote of 8 in 1912—Vermont and Utah, I believe. But I am glad to note that there are many Republicans in this House who, despite their training to the contrary, know a good thing when they see it and will vote for this bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who has filed a minority report on this bill, seems to think that this is a bill designed to help certain sections of the country at the expense of the others. Why, Mr. Chairman, nothing could be further from the truth. I know of no measure that could possibly pass this House that would be of more general benefit to the entire country than the one that we now have under consideration. A comprehensive system of public highways will add more to the wealth of the United States and the prosperity and happiness of its people than any other improvement of which I can conceive, and it is unworthy of the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that it is a sectional matter and ought not to be passed.

Now I read from the minority report which he has filed the following excerpt:

The States of Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, and Pennsylvania will pay into the Federal Treasury the larger proportion of the sum appropriated in this measure, and will receive in some cases less than one-quarter the amount paid in, while other States will receive relatively twice as much as they contribute to the Federal Treasury.

Now, what does that argument of the gentleman mean in its final analysis? It simply means that when this Congress goes to appropriate money to carry on this Government that it must be careful to see that each State receives as much money as it pays into the Public Treasury. How does the gentleman from Massachusetts think that rule would work as to rivers and harbors, public buildings and grounds, pensions, Army and Navy expenditures, appropriation for the Post Office Department, and all the other activities of the Federal Government? Under such a rule as that I am sure that the gentleman would concede that we Representatives from the Southern States would have a grievance. But there is no such rule, never has been, and could not be in the orderly conduct of the affairs of this Government. Now, let us apply the gentleman's standard of measure which he prescribes to the matter of pensions, for instance, and see how it works out. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, the report of the Commissioner of Pensions shows that the sum of $171,337,455.61 was paid out of the Treasury of the United States for pensions, and of this amount the six States which the gentleman mentions in his minority report, viz, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, received a total of $60,200,566.36, or a little more than 35 per cent of the whole fund. Does the gentleman think that the other 42 States of this Union should oppose pensions in worthy cases merely because 35 cents out of every dollar appropriated for that purpose goes to the six States which he has named? Why, of course, he does not. He would reply at once that the reason that these six States get so large a portion of the pension money is because they have the pensioners who are entitled to receive it.

And so I say, in regard to this bill, the reason that some States will get more money, relatively, than others is because they have more population, more mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes, all of which are used as a basis of consideration in this bill and are just and equitable. The bill does not provide for any particular amount for any particular State, except the $65,000 that is arbitrarily given to each State regardless of its size and population, and then the balance that it will receive will depend entirely upon its population, together with mileage of rural routes and star mail routes. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts mentioned the State of Delaware in his remarks on this bill, for the purpose of comparison—that State of which ex-Senator John J. Ingalls, I believe, once said "had three counties at low tide and two at high tide." Now, I have not anything against the State of Delaware; it is all right. It has one Representative in Congress—Mr. MILLER—and I think he is a fine young man, and I like him and hope he will vote for this bill. He ought to, because he will find that Delaware fares all right under this bill.

Let us see how Delaware fares under this bill. If it becomes a law, Delaware will receive $103,290, and I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that Delaware had a total mileage of 3,000 miles of public roads within her borders on January 1, 1915. Figuring, then, from a mileage standpoint of public roads, Delaware would receive $34.43 for every mile of public road within her borders. Now, let us see how my own State of Texas fares under the bill in this respect. Under the bill it is estimated that Texas will receive the sum of $1,070,386. On January 1, 1915, the State of Texas had 128,971 miles of public roads; therefore we would receive under this bill $8.30 for each mile of public road that we have in Texas.

In other words, the State of Delaware, which the gentleman used as an illustration to fortify his complaint, receives $34.43 for each mile of public road that it has and Texas only receives $8.30 for each mile of public road that it has. Suppose we take the gentleman's own State of Massachusetts. Massachusetts will receive under the provisions of this bill $535,420. On January 1, 1915, the State of Massachusetts had within its borders 17,272 miles of public road, and would therefore receive $31 for every mile of public road they have, against $8.30 per mile for Texas. And take, if you please, the State of the chairman of this committee, Hon. DORSEY W. SHACKLEFORD. Certainly if the committee had wanted to favor any State it would not have overlooked the chairman of the Roads Committee of this House. Under the terms of this bill it is estimated that the State of Missouri will receive the sum of $974,114. On January 1, 1915, the State of Missouri had 120,000 miles of public roads, and therefore will only receive $8.12 for each mile of public road that she has within her borders, as against the figures heretofore given as to Delaware and Massachusetts. And going further, let us take, if you please, the other five States to which the gentleman referred: Connecticut would receive $20.56; New York, $19.90; New Jersey, $29.50; Ohio, $14.32; and Pennsylvania, $16.70 for every mile of public road which they have within their borders. The general average for the six States which the gentleman names would be about $22 per mile, whereas the general average for the 48 States as a whole is, in round numbers, $11 for each mile of public road in the United States.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman ought to congratulate himself that these States have fared so well. If the committee had framed this bill so that the amount available for each State would have depended upon its mileage of public roads, then the States mentioned by the gentleman would not have fared so well and he might have had cause for complaint. But the bill is not framed that way. It first apportions $65,000 to each State irrespective of size and population, and then apportions the balance according to population and rural-route and star-route mileage; and so, instead of complaining at the bill on that score, the gentleman from Massachusetts should be shaking hands with himself that the States in which he seems so much interested have fared so well.

Now, the gentleman named Texas as one of the States which did not appropriate anything directly for the aid of public roads last year, and, strictly speaking, I think the gentleman is correct, for we have as yet no State highway commission. But it would perhaps not be out of place to say that in 1914 the various localities of Texas spent $8,750,000 in building roads, which was only exceeded by eight of the other States of the Union, viz, Colorado, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin; and we to-day have nearly 1,000 miles more of hard-surfaced roads than the State of Massachusetts. But, of course, we have a much larger State and we need many more miles of hard-surfaced roads yet, and will surely get them as time rolls on.

THIS BILL WILL NOT HINDER STATE AND LOCAL ACTIVITY BUT WILL ENCOURAGE AND HELP.

Now, another phase of this matter which I desire to notice for a moment is the inquiry propounded by my colleague from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. The inquiry was this:

Does not the gentleman think that if the appropriation is once made out of the Federal Treasury for the construction of highways, it will absolutely paralyze all local movement and that no community will ever thereafter be willing to do anything for itself?

The gentleman from Massachusetts made quick reply to this inquiry by stating that he thought it would have such effect. Now, it seems to me that that is a far-fetched conclusion and not supported by any process of logic or reasoning. In my opinion, if no other results followed the appropriation of $25,000,000 authorized by this bill than the stimulus that it would give to the improvement and development of postal highways all over the United States, it would be the best $25,000,000 that this Government has spent in many a day. The time has come, Mr. Chairman, when one of the most serious problems that exists in our social and economic life, is the crowding of our people into the cities and the complex problems of poverty and unemployment that so naturally follow this condition. Why, sir, in 1790 only 3.35 per cent of our people lived in the cities; 30 years later, in 1820, only 4.93 per cent of our population lived in cities; 30 years later than this, in 1850, the percentage had increased to 12.49 per cent; and still 30 years later, in 1880, the percentage had grown to 22.57 per cent, and to-day more than 40 per cent of the entire population of the United States live in cities of more than 2,500 inhabitants.

Is it any wonder that the cost of living is mounting higher and higher? It is bound to do so so long as our consuming class increases so out of proportion to the producing class. Why, if this condition of affairs is not remedied by wise foresight and prompt action and is allowed to go on as it now is—

The lamb that followed Mary
Will no longer be seen around,
For she'll sell the little critter
At 20 cents a pound.

What are we going to do about it? I contend that the best remedy in the world is to build good roads, improved school facilities, an efficient and sufficient system of rural credits—such as I believe this Congress is going to pass—and encourage our people back to the farm and make farm life agreeable and desirable.

THIS BILL IS NOT CLASS LEGISLATION.

But the gentleman said yesterday that this would be class legislation because forsooth it would benefit the farmers in a more direct way than any other class. Indeed, that is a strange argument to use in a body possessing the collective intelligence of the United States Congress. Does the gentleman think that the money appropriated for the improvement of our great harbors is class legislation, because perchance it will more directly benefit the ships that sail the seas? Does he think that the great Federal reserve act, that will surely prove a safe anchor in every time of financial storm, is class legislation because it operates through our banking system and does not overturn it? In fact, did the gentleman think at all when he said that this was a piece of class legislation? This is a strange statement to come from a Member possessing the intelligence of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have found that reckless statements are sometimes made in this House. I heard the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], on Thursday of this week, while speaking during consideration of the urgent deficiency bill, indulge in about 40 minutes' verbal exercise criticizing the President of the United States for his dealing with the Mexican problem, and in to-day's Washington Post I notice an extract from a speech delivered by a distinguished private citizen of the United States, ex-President Roosevelt, at Philadelphia one day this week, in which he says:

Individuals and nations who preach the doctrine of milk and water invariably have in them a softness of fiber which means that they fear to antagonize those who preach the doctrine of blood and iron.

Indeed, that is a fine-sounding phrase to be uttered by an ex-President of the United States. Indeed, one would be led to think from remarks like these that we are a Nation of cowards. Now, it is my good fortune to be a Representative in Congress from Texas, and I hope I may be permitted to say that Texans are neither afraid to fight nor too proud to fight. The State that gave to history the story of San Jacinto and the Alamo is not of the milk and water variety, but Texas does not want any war with Mexico or any other country. We want peace. And we hope that President Wilson will continue in the future to disregard the jingoes as he has in the past and continue to exercise the patience, judgment, and forbearance that has thus far led us safely into paths of peace. Every patriotic American citizen should be giving him his sympathetic cooperation instead of hurling at him a lot of harangue that means nothing and possesses less than no merit at all. Such intemperate utterances as some of these we are hearing now remind me of an anecdote that the late ex-Gov. Bob Taylor used to tell in one of his lectures when referring to these fellows who are always spoiling for a fight. He said that back in Tennessee they had on trial a negro who had posed as a "bully" among the members of his race and that the prosecuting attorney brought in an old negro servant who lived in the community to testify as to this "bad nigger's" character.

When the old negro was asked as to "Bill's" reputation for being a fussy, quarrelsome, and dangerous "nigger," he said, "Well, boss, Bill is very vivid in verbal exercise and is powerful active in his linguistics, but," said he, "when it comes to personal adjustment he is not so eager for de contex." Well, now, my friends, when it comes to verbal exercise and activity in their linguistics, some of these gentlemen who are so viciously attacking the President are very proficient, but if it should come to a matter of personal adjustment, I do not know that they would make any greater rush for the front than any of the rest of us.

But I hope, Mr. Chairman, that I will be pardoned for having made this digression at this point, and will now return to a further discussion of the bill which we are considering. When I digressed I was discussing the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], to the effect that this good-roads bill was a matter of class legislation. I have never had any of that disposition to array the city against the country or the country against the city. "A man's a man for a' that," whether he lives in the city or the country. "But there is neither east nor west, border nor breed, nor birth, when two strong men stand face to face, though they come from the ends of the earth." Just as one stone laid well upon the other makes the massive structure when completed, with all of its symmetry and proportion, just so does the citizenship of the city and the citizenship of the country blend together and make our Commonwealth what it is to-day; and any legislation that contributes to the progress and welfare of our rural communities is bound to benefit the city, and it is idle to talk about it being class legislation.

CONCLUSION.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in closing I wish to express the hope that the pledge of the Democratic Party made at Baltimore, to extend national aid to the States in the construction and maintenance of good roads, will be redeemed by this bill becoming a law. And if it does become a law, it will take its place alongside the other notable constructive legislation of this Democratic administration, and we will go before the country in 1916 with a record of achievement unsurpassed in the political annals of the United States. We will have accomplished things and not merely talked about them. And, Mr. Chairman, I have no fears but that a grateful and appreciative people will reciprocate by giving their unreserved indorsement at the polls.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN] to use some of his time.

Mr. DUNN. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COLEMAN].

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of attention to the arguments advanced by those who favor this bill, and likewise to the very splendid address of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and others in opposition thereto. It is apparent that a favorable sentiment exists in this House toward this measure, and this fact, in connection with the almost unanimous recommendation of the committee, indicates that the bill will pass. Notwithstanding these facts, I take my stand with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and others in opposition to the bill.

During my brief experience in this Hall I have been impressed with the continuous and insistent demand for selfish legislation. The cry for increased paternalism is most persistent. No one who is advocating the passage of this bill will pretend that the advantages by way of increased commercial facilities to those who will be obliged to pay the bulk of the taxes will be in any manner commensurate to the benefits of those who live in the neighborhoods where the improvements are made. It is a proposal, under whatever name you put it, to tax the people who in many cases have already burdened themselves for improvement in their own localities to build roads for others in localities where the people will not pay the expense of their own improvements. You are asking that the people who do not have the advantages of good roads, either from neglect or inability to provide them, be given improved roads at the expense of localities already burdened in many cases with heavy bond issues for their own local improvements. In the county which I have the honor in part to represent we have issued road bonds which remain unpaid to the amount of $12,250,000, and in addition to this sum for the freeing of toll bridges additional bonds amounting to $5,200,000, making in all $17,450,000 which was done as much for the farmers in our community as for any other class of people. And now you propose to lay additional burdens upon us to build roads for those who will not pay the expense of their own road building.

You say that the communities in which you are interested are not able to pay for extensive road improvements. Even so, ought you to ask others to do that work for you? Remember that the older communities have passed through the same conditions through which the newer ones are now passing. Remember that increased population brings with it increased burdens, and in the natural order of things there is a sort of equalization, as the larger communities must pay extra taxes in order to make the necessary improvements to accommodate the larger number of people. That is the reason why France and other countries with dense population have the better roads. It is in the natural order of development.

In this debate much concern is shown for the farmer. Now, we are all interested in the welfare of the farmer, just as we are interested in the welfare of every other class of the American people; but I do not think it out of place to suggest to you that the National Government in recent years has done much, and perhaps more for the farmer than for any other class of our people. [Applause.] Look over the increased expenditures of the governmental departments during the past 10 years, and you will find that the Agricultural Department has increased its expenditures 250 per cent, largely in the interest of the American farmer. It was surely considered a great boon when the Rural Delivery Service was extended for the benefit of the farmer, and Uncle Sam carried the farmer's mail over the farmer's own muddy roads to his door, and instead of receiving the thanks of the farmer for tramping through the mire, Uncle Sam is now asked to build improved roads in order to keep his feet clean.

But while we are discussing the farmer let me call your attention to the fact that there are a respectable number of these honored gentlemen in the Eastern States who have given of their means to build roads in their own neighborhoods, and you have no right to ask them now to give further of their means to build roads in localities hundreds of miles away. As I have already stated, you propose to lay additional burdens of taxation for road improvements on those who have done their duty for the benefit of people who in the exercise of their rights of local self-government have refused to tax themselves, and now want to tax other people to do what they refuse to do for themselves.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLEMAN. I will.

Mr. FIELDS. Does the gentleman believe that the harbors of our country should be maintained by the Federal Government or by the citizens along the coast?

Mr. COLEMAN. I believe that they should be constructed by the Federal Government, because they are controlled by the Federal Government, as every Federal improvement should be controlled, and not for the benefit of any local community.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. COLEMAN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. Does the gentleman contend that the only benefit derived from roads is the benefit derived by the people who live immediately upon the roads?

Mr. COLEMAN. That is not the only benefit.

Mr. FIELDS. If the gentleman did believe that, would it not be a proper argument to apply to the ports and harbors of our country?

Mr. COLEMAN. No.

Mr. FIELDS. I suppose the gentleman must live near one of the harbors of our country?

Mr. COLEMAN. No; I do not live particularly close. I live over in the western part of Pennsylvania, and we are not particularly close to a harbor.

But, gentlemen, this attempt to further tax people who have already taxed themselves in the performance of a local duty is most unjust. You may argue that the distribution you propose is an equitable one, but the facts will not sustain you. Let me call your attention to the inequality of the tax you purpose levying upon the people. The total amount of taxes raised from internal revenue during the fiscal year of 1915 was over $415,000,000, made up as follows: Ordinary, $335,000,000; corporation income, $39,000,000; and individual income, $41,000,000. Of this total of $415,000,000, the States of California, Illinois, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, 8 in all out of the 48, paid $249,000,000, or approximately five-eighths. And of the corporation-income tax the same States paid two-thirds and of the individual-income tax three-fourths of the whole. After taxing them thus heavily you propose by this bill to levy an additional burden, and out of the extra tax raised, of which these States will pay approximately five-eighths of the whole, you will give back to them $8,000,000, or less than one-third. That I say is most inequitable and unjust.

Is it any wonder that Democratic papers like the New York World should say:

> This is potentially the fattest pork barrel ever rolled on the floor of Congress for an emptying among hungry patriots and bucolic statesmen.

Is it to be wondered at when the Fort Worth Recorder, a Democratic paper down there in the home of the gentleman from Texas, should say:

> A Federal appropriation for roads under the circumstances is a pure gratuity to the State, for which Congress has no moral right to collect revenue and no legal right according to the honest intent of the Constitution.

I do not wish you to understand that I desire to raise a constitutional question. I do not. I am Hamiltonian in my principles, and believe in the power of the centralized government, but I take this opportunity to direct the attention of Congressman DAVIS, who a little while ago referred to Thomas Jefferson in 1806 and the appropriation for the Cumberland road. I say to him that there is a vast difference in the conditions that existed under the reign of that ancient leader of Democracy and under the rule of President Wilson in this day of modern Democracy. Then there was an overflowing Treasury, and the National Government did not know what to do with the money; but to-day there is a wonderful difference in conditions.

But I desire to call your attention further to the fact that in 1825 Thomas Jefferson, at a later period than when he was President, wrote like this:

> We declare to be most false and unfounded the doctrine that the compact in authorizing its Federal branch to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States has given them thereby a power to do whatever they may think or pretend would promote the general welfare, which construction would make that of itself a complete government without limitation of powers.

In that same article Jefferson is placing himself in opposition to the internal improvement of roads which he had advocated in 1806. So, in the beginning he was for it and at a later period against it. But when for it he argued that the Constitution be amended to give the Federal Government authority.

The Fort Worth Recorder said, in speaking of this measure:

> Looking to the National Government is bad enough when the aid is in the form of assistance in administrative affairs, but it is vastly worse in the form of a gift or gratuity, for it weakens the sense of self-reliance which States as well as individuals must preserve if they would maintain self-respect and develop their best qualities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. COLEMAN. Now, I agree that good roads are most desirable, but, in my judgment, they should be paid for by the local communities, for if there is any proper local function belonging to the State and the subdivisions of the State it is the improvement of their local highways.

Is it not apparent that if you open the door of the Federal Treasury, allowing some localities to take from the Treasury many times over what they pay in, their demands will be pressed year after year with increased vigor, and that it will necessarily result in the redrawing of sectional lines, an unfortunate condition, away from which in recent years we have been steadily traveling, as the States less able to make local improvements, arguing from the inequality in this bill established, go the further length of demanding that the wealthier Commonwealths pay still larger sums for the advantage of their weaker sister communities?

Somebody said on the floor to-day that the bill would increase the development of road building. I think it is more reasonable to contend that it will deter road building, because if the Federal Government is going to hold out the hope to communities that have not been active in self-improvement that they will get money from the Federal Treasury, will they not naturally put off local improvement until they can send some persuasive Congressman to this floor who will bring back home a large appropriation? Will it not necessarily result in electing men to this body on an issue of good roads, instead of upon what would be for the general benefit of this country? [Applause.]

Let us in this body rise up to the height of being national and not local representatives. [Applause.] Congressman SAUNDERS, of Virginia, in his eloquent speech in favor of this measure the other day, said, in effect, that we had passed far from the old idea that improvements of this kind were not within the limits of the Constitution, and while I most heartily agree with him in his statement, I would call his attention and the attention of others to the fact that we have passed far from many of the ideas of the fathers, and from none of them further than this, that the cheapest government is the best government. And whatever the justification for our having passed away from it, there were some people as recently as the Baltimore convention who adhered to it in part when they wrote in their platform, "We demand a return to that simplicity and economy that befits a democratic government." Yes, Mr. Chairman, we have wandered far from this old theory, and it may not be out of place at this critical stage in our history, with Federal taxation rising higher and higher, with a corporation and individual income tax added to our heretofore customs and internal duties, and the burden of an emergency war tax piled thereon, and an inheritance tax advocated from this floor, to suggest that we pause a little and take stock of our political conditions before traveling further in the direction of either European paternalism or European militarism.

Now, observe that the Federal Government has recently departed from its hitherto long-established custom of raising needed revenue at the customhouse and from the indirect internal duties, and has proceeded to collect a tax from corporations and on individual incomes; that by the corporation and income tax it has taken from the States, whatever the justification may be, important sources of revenue; that having trespassed upon the taxable property of the State and applied the revenue obtained, perhaps, in some measure of equality to the people of the entire country, you now propose to take these same revenues and apply them in a most unequal manner to a purely local problem. When you think of the $80,000,000 being raised from the Federal income tax and the $52,000,000 from the emergency revenue tax, and this amount added onto our heretofore accustomed sources of revenue, and the Treasury in an almost bankrupt condition, had you not better go slow before opening up new avenues into the Federal Treasury?

I am opposed to the measure because it is an unwarranted departure on the part of the Federal Government from its established policy and an entering upon a work heretofore considered as a purely local problem. I am opposed to the bill because it proposes a most unequal distribution of the Federal taxes for purely local purposes. I am opposed to it because at this time, with taxes already burdensome, no additional demands should be made on the Federal Treasury. I am further opposed to it because unwilling that the Federal Government should be given any additional sources of income than those already enjoyed, by which I mean the customs and internal taxes and the corporation and individual income taxes, believing that no further encroachments on the taxable property of the individual States at this time should be permitted. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I just want to take notice of what the last speaker said, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COLEMAN]. What is the proposition before this Congress? It is, according to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the people of this Republic should not have beneficial legislation in their behalf because the money comes out of the Treasury. The gentleman from Massachusetts the other day, and also the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] yesterday afternoon, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE] this afternoon, stated to this House that the farmers of this country are not entitled to this legislation. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE] said that our Republic has given the rural route system and carried mails through muddy roads to the farmers. He thinks that is a great favor which the Congress has conferred upon the people. I just cite the gentleman to the great cities of this Republic where nine mail deliveries are made a day and nothing is thought about it, and he thinks it is a great favor of the Government to carry mail once a day, or perhaps three times a week, to the man out in the country, the great taxpayer and supporter of this Government. It is a right that he has. He is entitled to good roads, and the Federal Government, with all of its activities, should give the farmers of this country roads over which to haul their produce to town.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen who are speaking against this bill and against the farmers of this country have never in their lives heard the notes of a whippoorwill. Gentlemen like that do not know the necessities of the agrarian classes of this country. I believe the Congress of this Republic ought to go as far as it can, and I am honest in that belief, within the bounds of constitutional limitations, to give the agricultural class all privileges and all legislation that will benefit them. I believe that they should have a rural-credit bill establishing a banking system for long-term farm loans at a very low rate of interest, with direct aid from the Federal Government. I believe that the great farming class of this Republic should have all the aid this Republic can give through its Congress, under the Constitution, to further the interests of the farmers. What more would good roads do? They would not only aid the country districts, but to a great extent aid the cities, because of the fact that the wealth comes out of the agricultural class into the cities; and we all recognize the fact that the great manufacturing and farming classes of this Republic must work hand in hand. One can not exist without the other. Surely the man who is fortunate enough to live in a great State like New York, Massachusetts, or Pennsylvania should not for one moment want to hold their fore feet in the Federal Treasury all of the time and keep off a few of these Western and Southern States. The South has been for years paying great pension bills where the people of other sections of the country have had their feet in the long trough drinking all of the slop. Do you mean to say that this road bill, that might take a little revenue from some of the great States of the East that have been preying on this Republic all of these years, should, forsooth, not pass for that reason? My friend from New York said that it would interfere with the "preparedness program." There has been an excuse for the last 50 years to keep the farmers of this Republic from coming into their rights, and at last they have come up with a great scheme to build unwarranted numbers of battleships and establish great armed camps in this Republic to trample on the rights of the farmer and say that he shall not have even a good road to travel over. [Applause.]

I am convinced that the farmers are the last people to be considered when it comes to legislation. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COLEMAN] said the farmer had been considered more than any other class in this Republic. I agree with him in part, but I wish to state that the farmer has been considered mostly as the man to get taxes out of—to pay for all the legislative schemes to further enrich the few.

How can you gentlemen in good faith oppose this bill to have the Federal Government aid in building good roads in every county in Mississippi and every other State of this Union, when you have been voting money out of the Treasury all of these years for every conceivable scheme for the benefit of a few?

The Southern States came out of the war with great debts, and the people impoverished, and heavy taxation has kept them from being able to build the roads you gentlemen from the Eastern States boast of. I am proud that you have such fine roads, and if my people had been situated like your people, we would have just such roads as you are now blessed with.

The $25,000,000 carried in this bill will do more good than any other similar sum that this Congress could appropriate. I believe in economy in Government, and have always been a strong advocate of it. I further believe in internal improvement of this country, and am going to vote for all measures that help the people and at the same time add assets and blessings to our country. If we had a splendid system of good roads in every county in the United States, our Nation could have no better asset except the splendid citizenry who would travel the roads.

Mr. Chairman, the farmer is put to a burdensome expense in marketing his crops. I claim that the Government not only owes it to him to help get a good road to haul it over, but I think the Government owes the farmer the further aid of extending the Bureau of Markets and getting in a good state of "preparedness" to help market the product of the farm. The city man and the farmer must be brought closer together. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COLEMAN] thinks the parcel post is for the benefit of no one except the farmer. He is mistaken in that idea, for the very reason that the farmer must be connected with some one on the other end of the line. His connection with the town or city man is going to benefit the town or city man as much as it benefits the farmer. The parcel post is a fine thing for the farmer, but it is not the only thing Congress ought to do to help him. I know this good-road business is not altogether the duty of the Federal Government, but it is manifestly the duty of this great Government to give reasonable aid in constructing roads to carry mail over to the farmers of the rural districts.

The Government has given subsidies to railroads and great corporate interests; now, why should it be prevented from helping the people who need help—the country people of this great Nation? [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on this bill, which proposes to authorize an appropriation of $25,000,000 to a public-roads fund to be distributed among the States, which I heartily indorse, for which I shall vote, and which I earnestly hope may soon be enacted into law; for there is no question in which the country is more interested than in the question of better roads, and no investment that the Government can make that will yield the return, either immediately or in the future, that an investment in road construction will yield. This statement is substantiated by the fact that the most prosperous communities and the most contented communities of our country are those communities which have a system of model roads.

And it is my fond hope, Mr. Chairman, that the day is not far distant when every section of this great country of ours, from the most densely populated sections to the farthest and most remote and most sparsely settled communities, may enjoy all the blessings that go with, and all the prosperity that accrues by, a thorough and complete system of public highways over which the farmers, the merchants, the lumbermen, the stockmen, and all other classes can convey their products at a minimum cost. All men will profit by an improvement of that kind, and no man will suffer as a result of it.

But a few of our city brethren object to this bill because, as they believe, it will benefit the farmers only. Well, let us analyze the proposition and see if their contentions are well founded, and to do this we must ascertain the relation of the rural community to the city, and the relation of the city to the rural community. Without the city the rural community can not develop and prosper, for its development and prosperity are measured by its markets for its farm products, timber, coal, and other raw materials, the large bulk of which find their markets in the cities. On the other hand, the city can not exist without the rural community to draw from. It must have the timber from the forest with which to build its factories, its storehouses, and its homes. It must have coal from the mines to heat them, and the produce from the farm on which to live. Destroy the cities and the farms will suffer. Destroy the farms and the cities will perish and die. Then, Mr. Chairman, we who come from the farms, we who belong to that strong and mighty army of 12,000,000 farmers upon whom not only the prosperity, but the life as well, of the cities depends, have a right to be proud of the part that we contribute to the life of the Nation, and of the position that we occupy among its men. Not only do we have a right to be proud, but we have a right to be heard in this Hall of national legislation, and a right to be recognized at the disbursing counter of the Federal Treasury. This right has been overlooked by the powers that have heretofore been in control. Until recently the farmers have petitioned the National Congress for recognition, and their petitions have been disregarded. They have whispered tenderly, and their echoes have fallen on deaf ears.

But, Mr. Chairman, the day has come when they petition no more for recognition, but demand their rights instead. They whisper no more, but speak in positive and certain terms. They are now receiving recognition in this body, and in my candid opinion will likewise receive it at the other end of the Capitol; and, mark my prediction, it will be fatal to those responsible if they fail to receive it. It is true that that we passed a bill of this character through this House in the last Congress which failed of consideration in the other body. But that failure was due to congested conditions and limited time, for which no one was to blame and for which no one was criticized. But conditions are different now. There is plenty of time; there is every reason why this bill should became a law, and not a single valid reason why it should not.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] told us on yesterday that the bill should not pass because it would call for additional expenditures of the people's money. Well, who are the people? Do they reside in New York only? No; they cover this country from ocean to ocean, and from the Lakes to the Gulf; and thousands—yea, millions—of them have never been directly benefited one penny by the Federal expenditures except though the Postal System. And I desire to add here, Mr. Chairman, that the passage of this bill will breathe anew the spirit of life into our Postal System, which is one of our greatest and most advanced agents of civilization, and in which the people are most deeply interested. It will result in the establishment of rural routes all over the country as a result of adequate roads for their operation. It will give the farmer his daily paper, his market report, his magazine, and his parcel post, delivered at his home instead of his having to travel 2, 3, and 4 miles to receive them, as many are forced to do under existing conditions. But, Mr. Chairman, when we mention improved postal facilities for the rural communities, some gentlemen from some of our great cities who have their mail delivered at their doors nine and ten times each day from a magnificent post-office building with stone surface and marble trimmings and floors, constructed and maintained by the Federal Government out of the public funds, remind us in agonizing terms that the postal receipts from those rural communities do not justify the expenditure necessary to their maintenance.

We concede the fact that a very large per cent of the Postal Service of the rural sections is operated at a cost much greater in volume than the revenues derived, while, on the other hand, the service in the cities is not only self-sustaining, but renders a return to the Treasury. But listen, gentlemen: Have not your cities any interest in those rural communities? From whence do these communities draw their wares and merchandise? Why, from the city, of course, either through the mail-order houses by parcel post, or through the local merchant, and he through his local jobber from the factories of the city; and, Mr. Chairman, at this point I venture this suggestion, and do it without fear of successful contradiction, that if the commerce to and from those sections of the country where the Postal Service is not self-sustaining should be withdrawn from the commerce of America, every city throughout the length and breadth of this land would seriously feel the effects, and many of them would be thrown into a panic. Therefore, as we read in Holy Writ, that no man liveth to himself alone, so do we read in the economic history of the nations that no community liveth to itself alone, either city, town, or county. Their interests are mutual and are so interwoven that they can not be distinguished in a commercial sense one from the other. Many of the European nations have long since recognized this fact and through governmental methods have inaugurated the reforms necessary to the welfare of the whole people, while our country has in a large measure been sectional in its public enterprises, thereby overlooking those reforms that are most general in their application.

There are 26,000 miles of navigable rivers in the United States, on which the Federal Government has expended $475,211,250. Why has it done so? It has done so because these rivers are public highways on which commerce is carried to and from the people. Then, as an economic proposition, if the water routes over which the commerce is carried are of sufficient importance to warrant the expenditure of public funds for the purpose of minimizing the cost of carriage, will not the same principle apply to the land routes over which the same commerce must be carried before it reaches or after it leaves the wharf at the river's bank, and especially so when the greatest reduction of cost will result through the improvement of the overland routes, as is the case, which is proven by the following figures.

An average ton of freight can be carried over the great waterways of the country 1,000 miles for $1.25. It can be carried 250 miles for that price over the railways of the country and only 3 miles over the average land routes, while in France, England, Germany, and Wales, where the roads are good, the overland charges do not reach half that sum. Then, Mr. Chairman, does it not stand to reason that the best field of investment for the Federal Government in the improvement of routes of commerce is in the overland routes which bring the products of the farm and the forest from their points of production to the points of mobilization where they are loaded on car or boat? Mr. Chairman, I trust that the city dwellers and their entire quota of Representatives on this floor may soon realize that they, as well as the citizens of the rural community, will profit by better roads in the rural communities over which their food products and much of their raw material must first travel. Better roads in those communities will lessen the cost of transportation, which is a very noticeable element in the cost of these products to the consumer. As I have previously stated, the interests of the people of both the city and country are mutual, and I sincerely trust that the day is not far distant when the imaginary walls or prejudices between them shall be torn down, or at least forgotten, on the floors of the House and Senate of the United States Congress. It is true that when legislation is proposed here to construct public improvements in the cities there comes more or less opposition from some of the country districts; and, on the other hand, when we propose to appropriate money for the improvement of roads in the country we find opposition from the city districts, but not from all city Members, I am proud to say. But, Mr. Chairman, this is all wrong. There should be no such feeling existing among the Representatives of the American people. We are all one people, citizens of one country, and we are, or should be, interested in all sections of the country, and should strive in a spirit of harmony and unison to make it a greater and better country; and we can only do that by the improvement of both the cities and the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my main object in addressing the House is to refer briefly to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] who addressed the House on yesterday afternoon and the vociferous gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE] who spoke a few minutes ago and who grew so pompous and bombastic that it was difficult for us to tell which side of the question he was on. These gentlemen, who reside in coast-line States which have harbors fortified and maintained by the Federal Government, oppose the passage of this bill on the ground that its application, if enacted into law, will be local and not national in character. I want to ask these gentlemen what they think of the forts and harbors on the coasts of their States. Are they local or national propositions? Of course they will say that they are national and should be maintained by the Federal Government, and we all agree that they are; and now, if by lack of proper harbor defense, the cities and coasts that are under the protection of these harbors should be bombarded and destroyed by the guns of a hostile fleet, who would suffer the greater loss, the citizens of the destroyed cities or the citizens of the interior who are hundreds or thousands of miles away? Why, the citizens of the unfortunate cities would, of course, be the principal sufferers. Therefore the benefits derived from our harbor defenses accrue primarily and directly to the citizens who live in the cities and and on the coasts thus protected, and these harbors and forts, 27 in number and constructed along the coasts of the United States, on which the Federal Government has up to this time expended $126,000,000, are local institutions from a geographic point of view, for the people living under their immediate protection are primarily and directly benefited by them, but the country as a whole receives an indirect benefit from them as a national defense, which makes them national in character. And, Mr. Chairman, the same argument will apply to public roads over which the people travel from community to community, from city to country, and from State to State, and over which the mail and the commerce of the people are carried from locality to locality, from city to country, and from State to State.

Mr. Chairman, I think that the gentlemen who are opposing this bill are advocates of stronger national defense. But will they contend that the strength of our national defense lies solely in, and is measured solely by, the number of men and guns that we possess? Do they not know that the transportation and mobilization of our resources which go to make up the supplies of our Army and Navy are also important elements in our national defense? Therefore would not a better system of roads, which constitute a part of our great international transportation system, over which are transported our soldiers and their food and other supplies necessary to their maintenance and operation, add to the efficiency of our Naval and Military Establishments? Why, Mr. Chairman, we are told by our military experts that the question of transportation is one of the very important questions in our national defense, and that the War Department and transportation companies of the country are now considering plans for a more adequate and more rapid system for times of need, and the importance of this system, Mr. Chairman, is not limited to its operations between the various Army posts of the country, but it extends over our waterways, railroads, and land routes to every nook and hamlet of this great country, from whence comes the volunteer soldiers and the supplies necessary to the maintenance of the Army. So, from a standpoint of national defense, our roads overland are interstate routes, and are not local in character, and they are most assuredly not as local in character or benefits as the fortified national harbors to which I have previously referred.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. ROGERS. Has the gentleman read the committee report recommending the adoption of this measure?

Mr. FIELDS. I have.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman recall that in two places in that report it is specifically stated that roads are local concerns?

Mr. FIELDS. I am comparing our public-roads system, as a part of our national defense, with the fortified harbors on our coasts, which also constitute a part of our national defense, but which, geographically, are, as the gentleman classes our public roads, local concerns extending their direct protection, their immediate and direct benefits to the people who live within their shadows, insuring them protection against foreign enemies. And yet these concerns were constructed and are maintained by the Federal Treasury out of the people's money. Seven million dollars have been spent up to this time on Boston Harbor in the gentleman's own State and $13,000,000 have been spent up to this time on New York Harbor; and it is being urged by Members from that State that a great deal more should be expended on it to properly insure the safety of the city of New York, and yet the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE] thinks that this bill, which proposes to distribute $25,000,000 of the public funds, or less than twice the amount that has been expended on New York Harbor, to the farming sections of the country, is both vicious and criminal. And the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] says that he "is amazed," terribly amazed, utterly and woefully amazed, that a committee of Congress should bring out a bill which proposes to appropriate the public funds in this way.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I claim to be a rigid economist, and I think that my record for economy in the expenditure of the public funds will compare favorably with the record of the gentleman from the Hudson [Mr. PLATT], and as an evidence of my sincerity I want to make him this proposition: If he will agree that the various vicinities along the sea coasts, wherein harbors have been fortified and are maintained by the Government, will return to the Government the $126,000,000 which it has thus far appropriated to the harbors, and agree to henceforth and forever maintain them at their own expense, I will take the liberty to say for the farmers that they will never again ask Congress to appropriate money for the construction or maintainance of public roads. But the gentleman will not accept my proposition, for he knows the farmers would get the better end of the deal. But he will continue to urge Congress to enlarge its sums for harbor defense, which is probably a wise and equitable doctrine, for our citizens along our coast lines are American citizens, and are entitled to adequate protection by their Government to insure their happiness and prosperity. But Mr. Chairman, while the enormous expenditures necessary to maintain our coast defenses are being drawn from the Public Treasury, I, for one, am unwilling to overlook or neglect the interests of those who reside in the interior of our country. I am unwilling to hush my voice in the cause of the farmer and his neighbor in the rural community, but to the contrary I shall contend so long as I am a Member of this body for his rights under the Government. And so long as the Congress shall appropriate public funds, just that long the farmers are entitled to their part of the amount appropriated; and, Mr. Chairman, every dollar appropriated to the public roads of the country will yield a due return to the Government, not only in revenue, but in the increased happiness and greater patriotism of the people, in better and more accessible schools in which to educate our children, more favorable environments under which to reverence and honor our flag, and more accessible churches in which to worship God. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I desire to register my approval of this bill primarily because it is a good-roads measure, and because, in my judgment, the Roads Committee has presented a plan as feasible, fair, and just as can be worked out on this proposition. Of all the criticisms that have been made, not a single Member up to this time has offered a suggestion that would improve the present bill. The plan worked out by the committee and embodied in this bill as nearly embraces every element of fairness and justice to all sections and to all the States as would appear practical from anything that has been said or from any suggestion that has been made. Therefore, I see no place for the sectionalism and provincialism that has entered into this discussion. For one, I am glad that Congress has seen fit to improve the great ports of the country like those at New York and Boston, because those ports are of interest to every American citizen and facilitate the handling of the products of the farm as well as the commerce of the cities.

This legislation is simply the reflection of national good-roads sentiment; is an act responsive to the general belief that the United States should assist in building and maintaining the highways over which the mails are carried, and the general demand that Congress enact legislation for that purpose.

In the enactment of this or like legislation the Congress should at least ask and have answered two questions—one as to the jurisdiction of the United States, and the other as to the number of American people to be benefited. The first is answered by the Constitution, which provides "that Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads." Reliable statistics will answer the second. There are in the United States 43,652 rural mail routes, with a combined length of 1,060,679 miles, over which travel 48,534 rural letter carriers, who for six days in each week deliver mail to more than 20,000,000 people at their homes, traveling annually 322,431,662 miles and carrying more than 3,000,000,000 pieces of mail.

There are 11,970 star routes, with a total length of 153,350 miles. These star routes reach the more remote sections in the rural districts with an estimated population of about 10,000,000 people. Hence this legislation would benefit directly more than 30,000,000 people, and indirectly our entire population.

We can not enact any law, we can not make any appropriation that would reach, help, and benefit a greater number of our people who deserve so well at the hands of this Congress than will this proposed road law and the appropriation it provides for.

Those living along these rural post roads, carrier and star routes make up practically our farming population, who I feel safe to say, have by all political parties been promised more and received less in performance than any other great class in this country, and for us now to enact this law would be a partial redemption of some of our pledges, and, at least, the liquidation of a portion of the accumulated interest on our unperformed promises.

The heaviest tax paid in this country is the bad-road tax. It has been estimated by the Bureau of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture that we have 2,500,000 miles of public roads. Over these roads are carried annually 350,000,000 tons of freight, consisting of farm products, supplies, and other articles. The average haul per ton is 8 miles. Over the unimproved road the cost per ton-mile is 23 cents, or $1.84 per ton for the average haul of 8 miles. Over the improved or surfaced road the cost per ton-mile is 13 cents, or $1.04 per ton for the average haul of 8 miles—a saving of 80 cents per ton. Hence on 350,000,000 tons, with universal good roads, the annual saving would be $280,000,000. So from a business standpoint no investment for the public could excel that made in building and maintaining the public roads.

Now, I would like to call the attention of those gentlemen who have spoken against this bill charging it with being class legislation—a discrimination against the cities—to some facts: The mail is carried to and from these great cities in the North, East, West, and South over trunk lines of railroads and with all the promptness, speed, and security that the mind of man and money can conceive, plan, and execute, and that for the building of these railway systems Congress donated millions of acres of the richest portion of the national domain worth hundreds of millions of dollars. It does seem that in view of all this we should not meet this protest against a bill which proposes to spend the proportionately small sum of $25,000,000 for the benefit of the mail service in the rural districts.

In Louisiana we are now spending annually $2,500,000 on our roads. Under this bill we would receive $345,064, which would come to us not only as a relief but in greater value as an encouragement to scientific road building.

This measure will materially assist in bringing about the three conditions essentially necessary to make life on the farm attractive, viz, good schools, good society, and good roads—good schools in which the farmer may know that his sons and daughters can receive the foundations of culture, good society in which is developed mutual sympathy and united effort for the advancement of the common good, and good roads for easy transportation of his products and for quick communication with his neighbors, his institutions, and the outside world.

To hasten the fulfillment of these conditions would be the effect of this legislation, and it should, in my humble judgment, have the approval of this Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman, the debate on this good-roads bill has demonstrated three things: First, that those States that have been the greatest beneficiaries of our tariff legislation are unalterably opposed to any bill that appropriates money out of the Federal Treasury that will be in any way beneficial to the great farming and producing masses of this country; second, that those who oppose the bill are not so much opposed to the amount of money that it appropriates as they are to the use to which it is to be put; and, third, the agitation for preparedness is to be used as a device to prevent all appropriations for internal improvements.

These three propositions, I think, are amply sustained by the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] in his discussion of the bill on last Wednesday and the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] and those made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] on yesterday. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], in the course of his remarks, said:

I say, sir, that this legislation is not wise, and I want to call the attention of the gentlemen on this side of the House especially to the fact that this is one of the measures which for several years has been in the platform of the Democratic Party.

The gentleman from Massachusetts is correct in that statement. The Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore in 1912 contained this plank:

We favor national aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

This platform declaration of the Democratic Party at Baltimore was but a reiteration of the Democratic platform on this subject adopted at Denver in 1908, practically in the same words, and the Democratic Party has endeavored in good faith to carry out this promise made to the great producing masses of the country. As soon as it was trusted with power by the people of the country and a Democratic House took over the control of legislation in March, 1911, the lower House of the Sixty-second Congress, which was the only branch of the Government that was Democratic, passed a good-roads bill. In the Sixty-third Congress we again passed a good-roads bill, and we are now about to redeem our pledge for the third time by passing this good-roads bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] said further:

While the Republican Party has not incorporated a plank for Federal aid but has simply asserted its belief in them and recommended the improvement of them to the several States of the Union.

I am perfectly willing for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to define the position of the Republican Party on this great question, and it is in exact keeping with the provisions of the Republican platform of 1908 on which Mr. Taft was elected to the Presidency, though they did not go even to that extent in 1912, and the subject was not mentioned in their platform in 1904. The position of the Republican Party as gathered from the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and their platform declaration is that they are willing that the people should have good roads provided the people themselves go down into their own pockets and dig up the money with which to construct them.

I am surprised that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] should take this position, in view of the fact that for more than 100 years the people of the United States, by a system of tariff taxation, have been building up the great industries of Massachusetts and making it one of the richest and greatest States in this Union.

What has the Government done for other lines of development? We appropriated for river and harbor purposes between 1789 and 1910, $583,895,000; for fortifications between 1820 and 1910, $130,625,000. We are spending to support the Army and Navy annually the sum of nearly $250,000,000. We spent in the construction of the Panama Canal nearly $400,000,000. Unthinkable millions have been collected from the people to build up our manufacturing industries. The Government has contributed to the railroads of our country 158,294,870 acres of our public domain to assist and encourage their construction. This land at the market price would produce $5,000,000,000—a sum sufficient to build and equip every line of railroad in the United States. We have appropriated for furthering irrigation projects in the arid regions of the West, $36,933,643.78. We appropriated $35,000,000 to build a Government railroad in Alaska. Our intervention in the war between Spain and Cuba has cost us more than a thousand million dollars. It is now being urged upon Congress to erect residences for our ministers and ambassadors to foreign countries, at an estimated cost of about $10,000,000.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] in the course of his remarks on this bill yesterday, in reply to a statement from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], said:

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman is talking about preparedness. Does he know of any way by which $25,000,000 could be used for preparedness to better advantage under the present circumstances than by the building of good roads?

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] made a complete answer to that inquiry in his questioning of the last speaker. The bill does not contemplate using this money exclusively, or at all, for military roads. That would be a different proposal. But here every lane and highway and byway of the Nation may be the recipient of Federal funds. The very first sentence in the bill says:

"That for the purpose of this act the term 'rural post roads' shall be held to mean any public road over which rural mail is or might be carried."

Any little cow path is just as much entitled to this aid as the Lincoln Highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

I gather from this statement that the opposition to this bill is not based so much on the idea it contains or the amount of money it appropriates as it is to the purpose for which the money is to be used. The gentleman said that the purpose that was contained in this bill was a proposition to aid in the construction of cow trails, meaning, I presume, that it was intended to aid in the construction of roads from the farm, where the products that go to feed the multiplied millions of this earth are produced, to the railroad station, from whence they are shipped to the great centers of population where they are to be used. He further said that this appropriation was not to be used in the construction of great interstate highways like the Lincoln Highway or the Old Trails Association, reaching from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], in his speech on this bill, urged as an objection to its passage the fact that we would soon be called upon to raise large sums of money for the so-called purpose of preparedness, and he criticized the patriotism of those who would appropriate money for the purpose of constructing good roads that might interfere with this program of preparedness. He said:

But what shall be said of Democrats who pursue such a policy? Will they not be regarded as traitors? Will the bribe of a few paltry dollars for their districts procure them forgiveness?

If a Member of Congress is to be denounced as a traitor to his country because he refuses to go wild in favor of appropriating untold billions of dollars to build warships and organize large standing armies when there is no enemy in sight and because he votes the small and insignificant sum of $25,000,000 to aid in the construction of good roads from the farm, where the products are produced, to the railroad station, where they are shipped, thereby increasing the price to the producer and decreasing the cost to the consumer, I am content to have the term traitor applied to me.

I desire briefly to call attention to the condition of the farmers of this country, as shown by the census figures. During the 10 years from 1900 to 1910 the population of the cities increased 34.8 per cent. The rural population during the same period increased 11.2 per cent. The per cent of increase in the city population was a little more than three times that of the increase in the rural population, and in making this estimate the Census Bureau included as a part of the rural population all towns having a population of 2,500 or less. The real increase as between the two classes of population is, therefore, much more than the census figures show. The per cent of increase in the number of farms from 1900 to 1910 was 10.9. The increase in the number of farms and the increase in rural population was practically the same, demonstrating the necessity of increasing the farming population if the number of farms are to be increased. In 1910 there were 6,361,502 farms in the United States and there were 2 per cent less owners and 2½ per cent more tenants living on farms than in 1900. In 1900, 31 per cent of the farms were under mortgage. In 1910, 33.6 per cent were under mortgage. In 1900 there were 67,719,410 cattle, 62,868,041 swine, and 61,503,713 sheep in the United States. In 1910 there were 61,803,866 cattle, 58,185,676 swine, and 52,441,861 sheep, a decrease during the 10 years from 1900 to 1910 of 5,915,544 cattle, 4,682,365 swine, and 9,055,852 sheep—8.7 per cent decrease in the number of cattle, 7.4 per cent decrease in the number of swine, and 14.7 per cent decrease in the number of sheep, and average decrease of 10.2 per cent in the source of our meat supply as against an increase in population in the entire country, including both the city and rural districts, of 21 per cent.

In 1900 we produced 1,619,415,263 pounds of butter; in 1910, 1,491,652,602 pounds. In 1900 we produced 298,344,642 pounds of cheese; in 1910, 320,532,181 pounds, an increase of only 0.07 per cent. In 1900 we exported 209,348,284 bushels of corn; in 1910 we exported 36,802,374 bushels, a decrease of 172,545,910 bushels within the 10-year period.

By comparison it will be found that the quantity of the present crops produced in the United States increased about 10 per cent between 1900 and 1910. This increase is substantially the same rate as the increase in the number of farms, which is 10.9 per cent, and the increase in the acreage, which was 9.9 per cent, the aggregate average production of these crops per farm and per acre remaining substantially unchanged during the decade, while the population of the country increased at a rate more than twice as great as the crop production, and the increase in the population of our cities being three and one-half times as great. These figures need no elaboration; no comment. They speak a condition which, if permitted to continue even for an inconsiderable length of time, as we reckon time, with the rapid increase in population, will bring want and hunger to the country. There were 6,361,502 farms in the United States according to the census of 1910. Of these 1,327,439, valued at $6,330,236,951, were mortgaged for $1,736,172,351, or 27.3 per cent of their value.

> Princes and lords may flourish or may fade.

Mr. Chairman, these prophetic words of Oliver Goldsmith, the Irish bard, uttered back in 1770, are applicable to conditions in the United States to-day. If the Congress of the United States continues to neglect the laboring and producing masses of the country, while it lavishes appropriations running into the billions for the purposes of war; the improvement of creeks, over which not as much freight is carried in the course of a year as is transported over an ordinary country road leading from the farm to the railroad station, we will soon be face to face with the condition which the British Parliament had to solve in Ireland less than half a century ago and which has called for an appropriation of two and one-half billion dollars out of the British Treasury to encourage a movement back to the farm in order that the British Nation might produce enough within its own borders to supply the necessities of its people. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR.] [Applause.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I want to talk about this bill for just a few moments for the purpose of getting my record straight. Four years ago and two years ago the committee reported and the House passed a very different kind of road bill. From my standpoint the committee has rather gotten the subject tangled up. Four years ago, when I first came to the House, we had no Roads Committee in the House, and a private committee was established under the chairmanship of the present distinguished and able Representative from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], the chairman of this committee, and that private committee prepared a road bill, which was put on as a rider to the Post Office appropriation bill and passed by the House that year. Substantially the same bill was passed by this House again last year. Now, that bill that has passed the House twice was a very different bill from the one that is before the House now. The bill that was passed at the last session of Congress and the session before that was a farmer's bill in a very large sense, and the bill that is before the House now is an automobilist's bill to a substantial extent. I wonder why some of our city friends are opposing it? It is quite as much in their interest as it is in the farmers' interest. I will explain to you what I mean. I have nothing in the world against automobilists. I am burdened with a piece of that kind of property myself, and I live in the city, too. But I believe that the primary object of this kind of legislation is to help the farmers of the country, and we ought to pass that kind of a bill that would help them in the most substantial way. The bill of last year will benefit the farmers most of all, and that was the main purpose of the legislation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I greatly regret to have to disagree with the conclusions of the committee in reporting this bill. I always like to agree with the committee. I want to say that I believe that the bill which passed this House last year is by far the better plan. It is a plan that is absolutely free from any constitutional objection. It is a plan that gives the greatest encouragement to the building of roads in every part of the country. It is a plan that is free from favoritism. It is a plan that will be of the greatest benefit to the rural letter carriers of the country—these Government agents that are required to go now along all kinds of roads and in all kinds of weather and who are of such great value to the farmer. It is a plan that gives to all the people the benefits of good roads.

Speaking for my own State, I want to say to the Members of this House that in a recent campaign I made this particular bill one of the issues of the campaign. It was an issue, too, that was heartily approved by the people. It was a plan that particularly appealed to the people because of its lack of favoritism, because it provided roads, not for the benefit of any class, not for the benefit of any particular locality, but in such a way that every class and every locality had an equal show to receive the benefits of the act. Speaking from actual experience, therefore, I believe that this House will make a great mistake if we change our bill now and adopt a different plan of aid to roads. The distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], than whom there is not a stronger advocate of roads in this House or elsewhere, and who has worked early and late for the cause, says that the reason for the change in the plan is because we have passed this bill twice in the House and have not been able to pass it in the Senate. I want to say to the gentleman and to other Members of this House that it is a mighty doubtful policy to swap horses in the middle of the stream. That plan certainly has had for two sessions the hearty approval of this House and, I believe, the approval of the people, and I do not believe that if we had passed the present plan in either of the former Congresses that the present plan would have been enacted into law. I believe those Senators who are opposed to the bill as constructed last session and the session before would have been opposed to the present plan, and when we undertake a change the chances are we will dissipate our strength.

Now, what is the difference between the two bills? I want to explain to you, if I may, just for a moment, the difference between the bill that you gentlemen passed last year and the bill that you are asked to pass this year. It is this: Last year all the roads of the country were divided into three classes, and all the roads of the country that conformed to those classes were to receive Federal aid to road building. This year we have adopted an entirely different policy. We are going to turn the appropriations over to the State highway commissions of the several States, and they are going to select, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, certain roads to be improved. The roads thus selected will, of course, form a very small percentage of all the roads in any State, and for that reason I do not think this bill is nearly so good as the bill that this House has passed upon twice and by which bill all the people would receive the benefits of the legislation.

Now, gentlemen, I am going to offer the bill that passed last year as a substitute for this bill when this bill comes on its passage. I believe that that bill is the better bill in every respect. I believe it is better because there is less favoritism about it. I believe it is better because more people get the benefits of Federal aid under it than will get them under this bill. I believe it is better for the reason that it will encourage State and county road building a hundredfold more than the present bill will do.

Now, mind you, I am going to vote for the present bill if I can not get the one that we passed last year. But why make this change? What is the reason for this change? This House has gone on record twice in saying that the bill of last year is a good bill and ought to become a law. Why is it that we make this change at this late day?

I have not seen a satisfactory answer given to that question. There may be one. I do not mean to say that there is not one. I certainly have great confidence in this committee, but I can not understand why "this horse was swapped in the middle of the stream."

I want to point out this, that I found by a recent experience that a bill of the kind we passed last year—a bill for Federal aid to road building—is a very popular bill.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. DENISON. What became of the other bill that passed the House twice?

Mr. McKELLAR. It failed in the Senate.

Mr. DENISON. Has it occurred to the gentleman that that fact perhaps had something to do with it?

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, as I said before, if the present bill had been passed by Congress last year or the year before it would have failed just as that one failed. It was not the peculiar form of that bill that caused its defeat. It was opposition to the whole policy.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is unwilling yet to speak for the Senate, I suppose?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am unwilling. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. We are all mighty glad that the gentleman is going to be in the Senate, but we all regret his departure from this House. [Applause.]

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for the kind words that he has just said about me. I appreciate them very much.

Now, I want to say to the other gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], who interrupted me just a little while ago, that I do not believe it makes a particle of difference what kind of a road bill we passed at the last session or the session before that. It was doomed to failure in the Senate. I will say to the gentleman that when we first began this propaganda four years ago we did not have a Committee on Roads in this House. And more than that, we who actively interested ourselves in the road movement here were published and advertised all over this country and designated as "dirt-roads statesmen" in derision, and yet in the short time of four years we find public sentiment has changed entirely and now there is a demand all over the country for Federal aid to roads, and instead of my distinguished friend here [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], the chairman of this great committee, being now termed a "dirt-roads statesman" he is one of the greatest statesmen in the country because he is at the head of this Federal road-building movement. [Applause.]

Having views that I have heretofore expressed, I am going to offer the bill of last year as a substitute for this bill, and I want to urge you gentlemen of this House before you vote to weigh carefully what you do. You have to go before all of the people of your several districts, and you are going to find that it will be hard to explain to the people why you abandoned a plan that is peculiarly in their interest, peculiarly in the farmers' interest, and adopted a plan that gives only certain routes and certain localities an opportunity to be improved. To give to these favorite localities indeed a great improvement, and I may say a much desired improvement, but at the same time leaving the vast body of your district, and perhaps many entire districts, without any Federal aid and without any Federal encouragement to State or county road building.

For those with these views I have reintroduced the bill which was passed by this House on February 10, 1914, and am going to offer it as a substitute for the committee's bill at the proper time. I do this because I believe it is a far better bill than the one the committee has reported out this session. If the substitute fails, I shall then support the present bill as being a step in the right direction. If the substitute is not adopted, I shall greatly regret to give up that plan, but I shall vote for the bill as reported out of the committee on the ground that it is the best that we can get. I am so heartily in favor of Federal aid to roads that I prefer to have a bill that does not meet my best judgment rather than to have no bill at all.

Gentlemen, I thank you very much. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I feel very much like the old lady felt in the Methodist prayer meeting. I would like to add my "testimony" to what the "brother" has just said.

It so happens that I was the first Democrat, by the actual record and not by claim, to introduce a bill similar, but in my humble judgment more liberal than the one now before the House. I did that on the 21st day of April, 1911. I hold in my hand a copy of the speech I delivered in the House on the 29th of February, 1912, on the question of Federal aid to public highways. That happened to be the first speech made under the Democratic organization for Federal aid to public highways, and the burden of converting all these brothers that we hear now supporting this good-roads movement devolved upon me, and I am proud of the job that I so well did. [Laughter and applause.]

I heard a gentleman this afternoon speaking about Federal aid for public highways, and I remember shortly after the delivery of my speech in 1912 he came into the cloakroom and made a remark about the impossibility of the Government ever appropriating money for roads and the foolhardiness of a young, "tender-footed" Congressman butting his head against a brick wall; and yet he made one of the best speeches I have heard in support of this bill, so I felt at liberty, as the original Federal-aid-to-public-highways man in this House, by the record, to say a few words to my city brothers. [Laughter.]

This bill in its operation is not such a bill as I would like to have seen enacted into law, because the wealthier States of the Nation, which have made greater advancement on account of their large taxable values than the purely agricultural States and the sparsely settled sections of the country, will receive the greatest benefit from this legislation, while the exact antithesis of this condition should be true. The purely agricultural and less able States of the Union, from a standpoint of taxable values, should receive the greater portion of the appropriation.

The object of this legislation, Mr. Chairman, is dual. Avoiding the unconstitutionality of the Government's appropriating money for such purposes in the States, the money expended under this bill is to be applied to roads over which rural delivery routes are operated. Under the regulations of the Post Office Department these rural delivery routes are operated only over those roads which justify the establishment of the rural route and which can be traversed readily by horse-drawn vehicles the year round.

Recently the Post Office Department has made what I conceive to be, so far as my State is concerned, a most grievous error in attempting to establish motor car service over the rural delivery routes generally. The mistake consists only in the department attempting to put on a service that would be most acceptable and economical but for the fact that the major portion of the roads over which rural delivery routes now operate are still unimproved.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, one of the great pieces of legislation passed in the Sixty-second Congress can not and will not be fully developed or its beneficent influence fully realized until the rural carrier can conveniently and more rapidly transport parcel-post mail. The use of the parcel post is only in its infancy, and the service will not reach the maximum of its usefulness until this country has on all of its rural delivery routes a network of permanent highways traversible every day in the year without inconvenience.

Therefore, the complaint registered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] is a complaint that any Member representing a large city, filled with glaring electric lights, asphalt-paved streets, and smooth sidewalks could register. It is a purely selfish one. He could say the same thing to his neighbor whose house had been unroofed by a cyclone: "I care not for my neighbor, whose family in exposed to the cold and the rain; the roof of my house remains intact."

There was a great statesman, one of the greatest that this continent ever produced, broad minded and generous, who could look out of his library window and his vision encompassed the entire Nation. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will peruse the great speech of the immortal Webster in his reply to Hayne I am sure it will broaden his vision and he can see benefits accruing to the entire Nation instead of demanding that all internal improvements be made within sight of his own front door. Mr. Webster said, upon the occasion when Mr. Hayne asked the question, "What interest has South Carolina in a canal in Ohio?"—

> Sir, we narrow-minded people of New England do not reason thus. Our notion of things is entirely different. We look upon the States not as separated, but as united. We love to dwell on that Union and on the mutual happiness which it has so much promoted and on the renown which it has so greatly contributed to acquire. In our contemplation Carolina and Ohio are parts of the same country—States united under the same General Government, having interests common, associated, intermingled. We do not impose geographical limits to our patriotic feelings or regard. We do not follow rivers and mountains and lines of latitude to find boundaries beyond which public improvements do not benefit us.

Mr. Chairman, there are three modes of transportation—public roads, railroads, and water. The railroads and great trans-Atlantic steamboats, carrying our commerce to the uttermost parts of the earth, are absolutely dependent upon the public highways of the Nation for their traffic. If it were not for the plodding farmer in the remote country districts of this Nation and the public highways leading to the great railway systems and to the navigable rivers of the Nation the people in the great civic centers would soon become the prey of hunger and be scattered over the face of the earth in search of food.

Mr. Chairman, it is estimated that good roads would add from $2 to $10 per acre to land values. The total area of farm lands in the United States is about 900,000,000 acres. It is estimated an increase of $5 an acre by the construction of good roads would add to our taxable values $4,500,000,000 per annum.

One of the greatest drawbacks to the farmer is the fact that under the present condition of the roads throughout the country he is practically isolated from market during the winter months. This is not only true in the South, where we do not have the continuous hard freezes incident to the climate of the States farther north, but it is true in practically nine-tenths of the States in the Union. No matter what prices corn, wheat, cotton, or other farm products are quoted at on a given day, if the roads are impassable the farmer is helpless to take advantage of the high prices; then when the roads are in passable condition and the great bulk of the staple crops is still in the hands of the farmer a general movement to market necessarily follows, depressing prices, and the farmer is the loser thereby.

Another great tax upon the farmers of the country attributable to bad roads is that at the very time the farmer should be hauling all of his fertilizers and going to market for all of his supplies he finds the roads impassable, and he is compelled to take good weather when he could be tilling the soil of his farm, to market his crops, and to do the necessary hauling incident to his farming activities.

Mr. Chairman, for the last few years we have been continually hearing the cry from every source of "Back to the farm." The brainy boys and girls of our rural districts are continually seeking to escape the social conditions prevalent in the country during the long, dreary, winter months of the year, attributable almost entirely to bad roads. The drift of our population from the rural districts to the cities is really becoming alarming. Much of the social isolation has been ameliorated by the extension of telephone lines in the country and rural free delivery, but these great conveniences do not yet satisfy those who live upon the farm. Instead of the winter months in the rural districts being the most pleasant and profitable of the year, they mean absolute social isolation. Bad roads prevent attendance at school and church; they make literary societies, social gatherings, club and lodge meetings practically impossible during the bad weather of the winter.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that I know the people who live upon the farms of this country as well as anyone. They are the most sociable people on the face of the earth. They love to go to church; they are ambitious to send their children to school. They love to visit one another and exchange ideas; they love to visit the sick; and when the week end comes they want to go to the nearest village store. The Representatives in this House who live in the large cities, either in an apartment house or in a private dwelling, can not appreciate these people. If a newcomer goes into the community, all the neighbors go and visit him and welcome him in their midst, but we can live in the large cities in an apartment house or next door to a family for 10 years and never know their names. So the cry of back to the farm will not be met, in my opinion, until something is done to make country life more attractive and the development of the farm more rapid.

In 1850, 12.5 per cent of the population of the United States were living in cities of 2,500 or over; in 1890, 35 per cent; in 1900, 40 per cent; in 1910, 46 per cent.

So, Mr. Chairman, it is my sincere hope that I may yet live to see the day dawn when this great lawmaking body will recognize that the future of this Nation depends largely upon the activities of this Government in making rural life more attractive by extending to the man on the farm many of the advantages that he does not now enjoy, and it affords me great pleasure to cast my vote for the bill under consideration, which I believe will ultimately do more for the upbuilding of the rural districts of this Nation than all the other legislation written upon the statute books in half a century.

Mr. Chairman, as I said in the outset this bill is not all that I had hoped for, but it is the best that could be done at this time under the unusual existing conditions. I hope that in the future these appropriations may be greatly increased and that the Government will, with the cooperation of the several States of the Union, rapidly construct a system of highways throughout the Nation second to none on the face of the globe, and in my judgment it will be the greatest asset and the richest legacy we can leave to posterity as a monument to the wisdom of the Democratic Party.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER]. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, in the limited time of five minutes it is impossible, of course, to say much about the merits of this bill, and therefore I must ask the privilege of extending my remarks.

Since I have been in Congress it has been my pleasure to support the bills that have come before the House which have directly affected the rural communities of our country. Out of more than a billion dollars that are appropriated each year for the expenses of the Government to carry on its business in all of its different departments, the amount that goes directly for the improvement of farming is less than 5 per cent.

We who represent Illinois upon this floor believe that it is a great State, and we realize, of course, that it is a rich State. I think Illinois does as many things for itself without calling on the Federal Government as any State in the Union. I believe we can put our record against that of any of the 47 other States. But when it comes to building roads throughout the States, that is an expensive proposition, and to levy taxes for that purpose upon the farms of Illinois will cost the farmers a good deal of money, which must be paid by taxation on the land. We have in our State a highway law and we appropriate each year for roads several hundred thousand dollars that goes to the different counties. We have also local taxation, which does build some roads; but, as we all realize, it is a slow process, and the farmers of this country need encouragement in this work.

I do not so closely question the constitutionality of this and other propositions as some gentlemen do, yet every man who serves upon this floor takes an oath to support the Constitution of the United States to the best of his ability as he understands it. But there are many questions that come here which are not free from doubt to a layman, who does not look at these questions from the standpoint of a lawyer, and he is apparently just as much in doubt as we are. I have listened to great lawyers who argued constitutional questions well upon both sides of this proposition; and in the end if this House passes a law which is unconstitutional, after we have used our best judgment, then it will go to another place, where the question of its constitutionality will be finally determined. As to myself, I believe that I am responsible to the constituents who have sent me here whom I try to represent upon this floor.

If there is a question of doubt in reference to the Constitution—which I do not believe there is in this case—I am willing to give the benefit of that doubt to the side which I believe to be right and which does the people the most good. There is one feature of this bill that is not satisfactory to me, and that is the section which, in my judgment, would enable the Secretary of Agriculture to send men out all over the country to inspect the roads. There might be an army of these employees scattered throughout the country. It is my judgment that we should trust the local and State highway commissioners or the governor, through his agents, to certify to the Secretary of Agriculture that the work has been properly done, and I hope to have such an amendment adopted that will meet this condition.

The only difficulty about expending $25,000,000 among all the States of the Union is that it is only a small beginning. Yet this small beginning is an encouragement to the people of all the local communities throughout the United States to help build their own roads. In Illinois we have the Dixie Trail; we have the Lincoln Trail, the Logan-Lee Highway; we have the National Road, the State Road, and all sorts of roads running over the State of Illinois, and the laying out of those roads encourages the people all through the neighboring part of the country to improve the condition of their local roads and make them better.

It occurs to me that of all the appropriations made by Congress directly to the people for improvements that none would be of more benefit than this bill in the aid of hard roads. It is said that those in the cities would get no benefit from the appropriations that improve the country roads. I would ask those who live in the city to consider that it is to their interest in building up a great city that there should be easy access to get in and out; that the roads should be improved; that they are interested in the proper system of roads that carry freight in the country and out of the country; and that they must remember that every farmer is located out a distance from the railroad and farm produce must be hauled to the station for shipment to the city. There has been for a number of years agitation to keep young men upon the farm. It is realized that too many of them leave the farm and seek employment of one kind or another in the city, and an effort has been made to try and prevent this condition. The last census showed that in a number of counties of certain States throughout the United States the rural population has decreased very materially.

Illinois, in more than 1,000 townships, in the rural communities lost in population. The last census showed an increase of 37 per cent in tenant farmers in the United States, so that with this large increase something should be done to stop this condition which in the end, if kept up, must ruin our rural class. The Industrial Commission, which lately made its report, showed in one great State the horrible example of tenant farmers and the increase of tenants on the farm each year. We can not expect to have the prosperous rural community and have renters on the farm. The farm should be owned by the man living on it just so far as possible, and encouragement should be given in a substantial way to assist him to own a farm. In this country we do not want to build up a system of landlordism, and our people will not tolerate it, for, in the end, it must mean ruin. You can not expect young men to remain upon the farm when during a long period of the season, while he is not busy, he must be isolated from his local city or village, from the social centers, on account of the roads which are impassable. Telephone and rural free delivery have been of very material advantage to the farmer, bringing him in closer communication with his local city, but we need to go further and provide some better means of transportation over the roads in the community. Congress appropriates each year millions of dollars for rivers and harbors in the interest of transportation and cheaper freight, which we believe to be beneficial to the people in shipping the products of the farm, mine, and factory; but good roads are just as important to reduce the cost of marketing farm products. It may be said by some that the farmers should build their own roads by taxing their land and personal property. The farmer has always been willing and does bear his just proportion of taxation. His income usually is small, and what he accumulates must be earned by hard work by himself and family. Getting rich upon the farm is a slow process, and but few ever accumulate a large amount of property. Millionaires are not found upon the farm, and yet the produce of the farm supplies a species of speculation after it leaves the farmer's hands, and many times more money and profit is realized from handling the product than the farmer himself receives.

In this country, of course we need better roads to enable the farmer to market his product and to haul what he must buy for use upon the farm back to his home. A system of marketing which will enable him to put his produce upon the market to the best advantage is always a matter of great interest and should be developed so he may reap a just reward for his labor. It is useless for anyone to go out and propose going back to the farm unless he can show that farming conditions are better then when the boy left it. The young man knows under what disadvantages he labored and how he had to travel through the mud and what little profit there was in it to him. In Illinois the State highway commission cooperates with the different counties in the State in reference to road building. The money which is each year appropriated in cooperation with the counties for building roads is a slow process. In many counties material for hard roads must be shipped quite a distance into the State, freight rates are high, and in the end the building of hard roads is so expensive that but little progress has yet been made, so that to-day most of our highways are only dirt roads, which in the winter time with rain, freezing, and thawing, become impassable for hauling of any freight or even traveling in any way. Illinois is a fairly rich State in comparison with others and our lands will compare favorably with most States, and yet our farmers feel that taxation for hard roads would be so great that they hesitate to vote upon themselves and their children this debt, which would be hard to pay, and especially such would be the case if failure of crops come, so in the end they may be greatly in debt and possibly lose their land. It is true that an appropriation of $25,000,000 is not large when divided up among the States, as proposed by this bill, as it will give only a small amount and will not build very many roads, but it will do some good and will encourage the farmers and show them the Federal Government realizes the importance of these improvements and is willing to aid them in this work.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT].

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, this bill does not contain any provision from which either the district that I represent or the city of New York, in which it is located, the metropolis of America, derives any direct benefit, yet I am not prepared to say, until I have given this bill further consideration, that we can not benefit indirectly in the same sense that the people of the whole country may benefit by the expenditure of money for the improvement of the port of New York. [Applause.] I am not provincial in my ideas. Any man who has lived in the city of New York, who has grown up with its commercial progress and advancement, must look to the East, to the West, to the North, and to the South; and the people of my city are as liberal minded as those of any other section of the country. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE] said to-day our State had appropriated the sum of $100,000,000 for good roads, and yet not one dollar of that amount has been nor will ever be expended in the city of New York. We in New York, however, will be called upon by the system of taxation which exists in our State to bear 74 per cent of that $100,000,000, all of which will be expended outside of the corporate limits of New York City, and in addition to that the people of the city of New York will be called upon in the future, as they have been called upon in the past, to improve, to extend, and to repair the streets and avenues and highways of New York City without any contribution whatever from the people who live outside of the city of New York. If the gentlemen on the other side of the House were equally consistent in their attitude upon good roads at Albany, we would be in more perfect accord.

Gentlemen, the consideration of this matter brings rather to my mind another question upon which I should like to digress for a few moments.

I have sought for a long time to ascertain the real definition and appreciate the application of the words "new project" as applied to legislation adopted by this House. I am constrained to the belief that the bill by which it is sought to appropriate the sum of $25,000,000 to be expended throughout the rural sections of this country is just as much a matter of a new project as the adoption of a provision for the improvement of the East River and New York Harbor.

I want to direct the attention of Members of this House to the fact that while $853,000,000 has been appropriated for river and harbor improvements, only $20,000,000, or less than 3 per cent of that amount, has been expended upon New York Harbor, and yet since 1881 there has been turned into the Federal Treasury from the port of New York $5,500,000,000, and the city of New York, to say nothing of private interests, has expended $8 to every $1 applied by the Federal Government for the development of the greatest harbor in the world and the most productive asset of the United States. In 1868 Congress adopted a project for the improvement of the East River by blasting out certain rocks, which menaced navigation, to a depth of 26 feet. But that was away back, 3 years after the Civil War, 48 years ago. The Government could afford to be liberal with the port of New York then. Up to 1912 about $6,000,000 was expended, and the project, with its modifications, carried 70 per cent to completion. Then the district Army engineer reported that the commercial necessities had outgrown river development, and recommended an amended project for a 35-foot channel and 30 feet to piers, at a cost of $33,000,000. The Board of Engineers scaled that down to $13,400,000, and it was adopted by the House at the first session of the Sixty-third Congress, but stricken out in Senator Burton's filibuster in the Senate. And there we stand to-day. Congress has ceased appropriations upon a project "the further improvement of which is reported as economically inadvisable," but refuses to provide a substitute in the greatest harbor in the world because it is opposed to taking on any "new project." This 35-foot channel from the Battery to Throgs Neck, a distance of only 16 miles, would give us an eastern deep-water entrance from the Atlantic Ocean into New York Bay and would provide New York, what does not exist in any port in the whole world, a double entrance and a double exit to New York Harbor, not only of enormous commercial value, but of strategic importance in the general plan of preparedness—a marine trench for naval purposes, as it were.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DUNN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. HULBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, the effect of that improvement on the East River to the extent that it has been improved is that during the past year the boats which navigate that stream carried a total commerce of 45,000,000 short tons, having a value of $1,500,000,000. In addition to which there have been transported on these boats 22,500,000 passengers; and yet because the district engineer has found the expenditure of money under the project of 1868 is economically inadvisable, because we can not induce this Congress to appreciate the necessity of the adoption of the new project recommended by the Chief of Engineers, since 1912 there has not been a dollar expended in the improvement of this great waterway. You talk here of a merchant marine and the building of our pan-American commerce, but I tell you now there are steamship lines having vessels actually in commission and desirous of making New York the home port, and we have not the docking facilities, because of lack of depth of water to accommodate them. I call attention to the fact that located on the East River is the Brooklyn Navy Yard, where you are building to-day vessels which have a draft of 30 to 31 feet, and yet the channel in the river is only 26 feet. The Secretary of the Navy within the past few days has addressed a letter to this House, which was referred to the Rivers and Harbors Committee, of which I am a member, and I desire to place that letter in the RECORD without reading it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a letter. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DECEMBER 21, 1915.

The SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the serious condition existing at the navy yard, Brooklyn, N. Y., in so far as pertains to the depth of water in ship channels leading thereto.

There is not sufficient water in these channels to insure the entering or leaving of a first-class battleship at all times.

At present only one battleship can be handled per day, and then only provided the weather conditions are normal. If the winds are such as to blow the water out of New York Bay then the depth of water in the approach channel is not sufficient to safely navigate a large ship. As an illustration, the following it noted:

On November 3, 1915, the U. S. S. Texas, one of our new first-class battleships, was ready to leave the yard, but the prevailing northwest winds had so reduced the depth of water in the Buttermilk Channel that even at high water there was not sufficient depth to insure her leaving the yard in safety. This ship therefore was forced to remain in the navy yard for over 24 hours.

This condition is a serious one and might cause grave complications. I understand there are two propositions before Congress—one providing a channel 35 feet deep and 1,000 feet wide in Buttermilk Channel, and the other north of Governors Island up the East River through Hell Gate. The second would provide for ships passing from the yard to lower New York Bay or to the Sound, a condition highly desirable from a strategic point of view. Either project will provide for free access to the navy yard.

The increase in size of ships has not yet reached its limit.

Through injuries received in battle, a ship could readily be drawing more water than normally at a time when it was most necessary to dock her.

It is therefore most urgent that an approach channel to the New York Navy Yard be maintained of not less than 35 feet depth at mean low water and 1,000 feet wide, and I can not too strongly urge the serious attention of Congress to this matter.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Mr. HULBERT. Now, I want to emphasize another fact. I do not say that there has been any discrimination against New York. I am not going to debate it. As a matter of fact, if any such charge were made, I would leave it to the determination of any unbiased mind.

But I want to call attention to a statement issued by the Post Office Department evidencing the fact that during the year 1914 the post-office receipts in the city of New York were upward of $29,500,000 and expenditures but $10,700,000, showing a net profit to the United States Government in the post office of the city of New York of upward of $18,800,000 to be applied to meet deficiencies in other sections of the country. In other words, the receipts from the city of New York post office were 10½ per cent of the total revenue of the Post Office Department of the whole United States for 1914. In spite of which fact I am called upon by many civic bodies in New York, composed of manufacturers and merchants from the Battery to the uppermost sections of the city, to enter my protest with those of my colleagues against the Postmaster General's proposed action in the great metropolis of America, the greatest in the world, whose postal receipts show a profit of $18,000,000 a year, by reducing the number of city deliveries in the business sections of that community. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD a letter I received on this subject from the Central Mercantile Association, and my reply, and the resolutions attached thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK, January 20, 1916.

Hon. MURRAY HULBERT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Inclosed herewith please find resolution unanimously adopted by our board of directors on the 18th instant, protesting against any reduction in the mail deliveries in the business section of this city.

Would also be pleased to have you present this matter to Chairman MOON, of the Post Office Committee of the House.

Thanking you very kindly for your attention to this matter, beg to remain,

Yours, very truly,

CENTRAL MERCANTILE ASSOCIATION,
JOS. E. KEAN, Secretary.

Protest of board of directors and members of Central Mercantile Association against proposed reduction in mail deliveries in New York City.

Whereas it has been brought to our attention through the public press that the House of Representatives Committee on Post Offices, with First Assistant Postmaster General Roper, have under consideration a reduction of the number of mail deliveries in the business districts in this city: Therefore be it

Resolved, That immediate attention be called to the facts and conditions existing as to the total revenue of New York post office, which was upward of $29,500,000 in the year 1914; the total expenses of the New York post office for the year 1914 were about $10,700,000, showing a net profit to the United States Government of upward of $18,800,000 for this particular year. That the total revenues of the New York post office were over 10½ per cent of the total revenues of the Post Office Department for the whole United States for the year 1914.

Resolved further, That the board of directors of the Central Mercantile Association (comprising the great majority of the larger manufacturing, wholesale, and retail firms and real-property owners between Canal Street and Thirty-fourth Street, Fourth Avenue and North River) vigorously protest against any reduction in the number of mail deliveries daily in the business section of the city of New York, because it would result in much delay and great detriment to and seriously retard the daily mail-order business which is transacted by practically all manufacturing, wholesale, and jobbing houses in this city with business firms in all other towns and cities: Be it further

Resolved, That because of the vast volume of business done by mail order, that any reduction in mail delivery would necessarily result in a reduction of the postal revenue at the New York post office and likewise retard the general business of parcel-post delivery: And be it further

Resolved, That the President be urged to appoint a special committee to take the matter up and present such facts as may be necessary to the Post Office Department and to the Members of Congress in regard to the mail deliveries in New York City.

NEW YORK CITY, January 18, 1916.

NEW YORK BOARD OF TRADE AND TRANSPORTATION,
New York, January 12, 1916.

Protest against proposed reduction in mail deliveries in New York City unanimously adopted by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation.

Whereas it is reported that the House of Representatives Committee on Post Offices, with First Assistant Postmaster General Roper, have under consideration a curtailment of the number of mail deliveries in the business districts in this city: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we invite attention to the facts that the total revenue of the New York post office was $29,488,518.02 in the year 1914; that the total expenses of the New York post office for the year 1914 were $10,686,996.28; that the New York post office, therefore, produced a net profit to the United States Government of $18,801,521.74 for the year 1914; that the total revenues of the New York post office were over 10½ per cent of the total revenues of the Post Office Department for the whole United States for the year 1914;

Resolved, That we protest against any curtailment of the number of mail deliveries daily in the business sections of the city of New York, because it would result in delaying delivery of all mail from all parts of the country destined for New York business houses and injure the merchants and buyers in all other cities and places, and we further protest because experience in the New York post office shows that mail coming for delivery in this city is so vast in volume that any curtailment of the number of deliveries would cause an accumulation so great as to necessitate the employment of a larger number of carriers to enable them to make delivery on a reduced number of deliveries, and would thus cause an increase of expense instead of a reduction thereof;

Resolved, That the president be authorized to appoint a special committee to make proper representation of the facts to the Post Office Department and Members of Congress in regard to the mail deliveries in New York.

A true copy.

S. V. V. HUNTINGTON, President.

Attest:

FRANK S. GARDNER, Secretary.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRITT].

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support, in a few words, the pending bill. I chance to be the farthest south Republican Member of this body in the eastern section of the United States, and yet I most heartily and gladly join with the Democratic chairman of the Committee on Roads in support of this bill, for the reason that I believe it to be founded on certain great essential and necessary principles. I think the bill meets many conditions which should be met, and should be met now. It has been said on this floor to-day that it was a discrimination in favor of the country and against the city. Such has been the substantial import of certain arguments. Can it be that gentlemen will come here and advocate the construction, at great expense, of splendid post-office buildings in our cities and towns, and yet hold that it is unconstitutional and impolitic to expend a dollar to make a post road along which the mail may be carried from that office to the man who chances to live in the country? I think the bill gives a splendid definition of the term post roads. It applies it to all of the country and to all of the towns, boroughs, and cities of less than 2,000 population, and it makes it apply to cities of more than 2,000 population if the houses chance to be upon an average of more than 200 feet apart. I think the distribution of the money is splendidly made and upon a most excellent and sound basis. In the first place, it recognizes the individual sovereignty of the States after the analogy of the apportionment of Senators in Congress, by giving the little States, such as Delaware and Rhode Island, $65,000 to start with, just as is given to the States of New York and Texas. In the next place, it recognizes the proportionate population of the States by the last decennial census, giving to each State one-half the remainder upon the ratio which the population of the State bears to the population of the whole country. It then apportions the remainder according to the relative mileage of rural routes and star routes in each State, an easily ascertainable fact.

When the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] referred to the Cumberland Road, he stopped short of telling this House that it was because of the construction of that road, and because of the Federal aid which constructed it, that the great section of the country in which he lives and which he represents had its development in the opening up of that wonderful country in the impetus given immigration by the construction of this road.

I live in a district which is rural and mountainous. I live in a State in which we as a State, as counties, as municipalities and townships, have done and are doing all that our resources will permit us to do in the way of construction of highways. We can not do all that should be done in a large district like mine, a district of a quarter of a million people, comprising 13 counties, a mountainous section, with rivers and valleys and deep gorges. We need the assistance which the Federal Government has given to hundreds and hundreds of less meritorious things. Can it be that since 1878 we have expended $650,000,000 to improve the rivers and harbors, not a penny of which has come directly to the benefit of the people of the district which I have the honor to represent, and yet that not a dollar, as some gentlemen say, be used to construct and maintain a road, perchance, to go out of the city into the rural sections? Can it be that we have given 197,000,000 acres of our western lands toward the construction of railroads as a great public subvention, and yet that we should not give to the rural sections a dollar in order that they may have better roads over which to carry the mails, over which to carry their produce, and better roads over which their children may go to school? Can it be that we may spend $500,000,000 upon the construction of the Panama Canal—for that is what it will amount to before it is completed, and I approve it most heartily, although it is thousands of miles from us—and yet it will be unconstitutional and impolitic to expend any money to construct highways upon which the rural citizens, the plain farmers, out in God's own free country, where men do their best work and think their purest thoughts and act their noblest parts, that it is unconstitutional and impolitic to spend a dollar for the construction of these roads? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this is not only a sound principle, it is a necessary measure. I urge it here to-day because the country people, who will be most largely benefited, have not received their just proportion of the distribution of public moneys by the Federal Government in its various governmental activities. Where are the large, costly buildings constructed for the Government? In the cities—and I am not against the cities. Where are the millions of dollars expended to dredge and clean the harbors in order that our ships may come in and go out with safety and facility? It is about the cities of the country. Where have the great expenditures been made for so many different public enterprises? They have been made most largely in and about the cities; and now the chairman of the Committee on Roads comes here with a bill which I think is a splendid bill in almost every particular and asks that rural routes and star routes and farmers' roads may be improved. Can we find a valid objection in all that has been stated? Not one. Some things said here to-day in opposition to this bill, to my mind, have been amusing rather than logical. Let me say once more it has been said that this is the entering wedge and that lavish expenditure will follow. It is said that we are building a road out to the farmer's house. Why, if that is the effect of it, what is it in the way of evil? If it should carry the road out into the country, out into the rural sections and past the farmer's house and result in a benefit to him and his family, is he not entitled to this as much as our sons and daughters are entitled to look upon splendid Government buildings in the cities? I live in a city myself. Are they not entitled to have some of the results of appropriative moneys of the Federal Government, even if it does not please the fancy of those gentlemen who chance to have no rural interests whatever in their districts?

The section in which I live has made great strides in road building. It can not do all that should be done. Over our mountains and up our hills and across our valleys we are laying out, constructing, and maintaining splendid roads, but we can not do it all. Gentlemen, those hills are as beautiful as God ever permitted man to look upon, and I could wish my colleagues no greater pleasure than to have them come at a time when the season is at its best and take an eyeful of the beauties of the mountains and valleys of my district. I am not asking for North Carolina anything to which she is not entitled as a part of the great policy which this Government has followed from the beginning in giving aid wherever wisdom and necessity have dictated that it should be given. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, one of the most vital questions which confronts the American people to-day is that of improving their public highways. This problem has been, up to the present, left by the National Government to be solved by the several States and their local political subdivisions in such manner as they may best be able. While this is a great burden for the States and smaller subdivisions to bear and while the interstate nature of many of these public roads and of present day traffic would seem to impose a part, at least, of this burden upon the National Government, yet these States and smaller subdivisions are assuming this burden in a manner becoming a great people, and great strides are being made in the direction of its solution. Evidence of this is afforded by the progress actually attained. The first authentic road census in this country was taken by the Office of Public Roads of the United States Department of Agriculture in the year 1904. This census disclosed the fact that we had a road mileage aggregating about 2,150,000, of which about 153,000 miles were improved. Our annual expenditure for road purposes that year amounted to about $80,000,000. In 1909 a second census was taken. This second census showed that during the five-year period the mileage of improved roads had increased to about 190,000, or nearly 25 per cent. The expenditures for that year were not obtained, but, according to figures recently compiled in the Office of Public Roads, the road expenditures for 1915 approximate the enormous sum of $200,000,000.

From these facts it is evident that the States and their minor subdivisions are putting forth a supreme effort to improve their highway conditions. It is apparent that they recognize the importance of this improvement and regard it of such pressing need that they are willing to spend their money and their energy in its accomplishment. This spirit of progressiveness should be commended. Not only should it be commended, but it should be rewarded by the National Government joining hands with the States and, through a spirit of wholesome cooperation and substantial money aid, assisting them in furthering the development of a better system of highways throughout this entire country.

Nearly every progressive undertaking looking to the advancement of our civilization is receiving some measure of aid or encouragement from our National Government. Laws have been enacted for the purpose of stimulating efforts in literature, the useful arts and inventions by a system of liberal copyrights, trade-marks, and patents. Annual contribution is made to the education of the youth of every State in the Union. Over $650,000,000 have been expended for the improvement of our rivers and harbors, and lighthouses and danger signals are maintained along all navigable waters to safeguard their commerce. Donations of public lands, aggregating 197,000,000 acres, have been made for the purpose of promoting railroad development throughout the country, and at present the Interstate Commerce Commission is maintained to prevent the railroads from charging excessive rates for transportation. The United States Department of Agriculture, with its corps of well-trained scientists, is engaged in trying to teach the farmers of the country to adopt better methods of farming so as to increase their annual production, which has already reached the $10,000,000,000 mark. But with all this, as broad as may seem the activities of our National Government, and as liberal as may be its appropriations, it has not yet joined hands with the people in aid of the improvement of our highways which are so vital to the welfare of our entire population, and particularly our rural population.

Consider for a moment the relative importance, as great national economic factors, of our farms and cities. Has it ever occurred to you that the American farm is the greatest known wealth producer, and that our cities are almost equally famous as wealth consumers? Such is, nevertheless, the case. Primarily, every city resident may be said to produce nothing. He is merely engaged in the consumption, distribution, or manipulation of that which is produced elsewhere, chiefly on the farm. On the other hand, every inhabitant of the farm may be said to be a producer, large or small, the value of their combined annual production exceeding the sum of $10,000,000,000.

Not only this, but a large per cent of the aggregate wealth of the United States is represented by farm property. Our total wealth at present is placed at about $150,000,000,000. Of this, more than $50,000,000,000, or about one-third, consists of farm property. The yearly return on this investment in farm property is represented by our ten billions of annual farm production, which is about 22.5 per cent of the money invested. There is scarcely another class of property in existence which yields such satisfactory returns or plays so important a part in our commercial and industrial development. This readily appears from the fact that in 1910 our exports of farm products, exclusive of forest products, amounted to $871,158,425, or 50.9 per cent of all domestic exports, while our imports of farm products amounted to $687,509,115, or only 44.2 per cent of the total imports, leaving in our favor a balance of $183,649,310.

But this vast wealth of farm products must be hauled over our public roads before reaching the channels of trade and commerce. It must be transported an average distance of about 9.4 miles before being served up as food for our city population or to provide raw material for running our manufactories or to swell the volume of our foreign commerce. It would seem, therefore, a duty of the National Government to help improve the highways over which these products must be hauled and thus facilitate their reaching the markets for further distribution. Exceeding care is taken and vast sums of money expended by the Federal Government to improve the channels of transportation through which they must pass after being removed from the farms. To promote this purpose donations of public lands aggregating 197,000,000 acres were made to the railroads; since 1875 more than $650,000,000 have been appropriated from our National Treasury for the improvement of our rivers and harbors; and the mammoth project of all ages is now being prosecuted in Panama, where approximately $500,000,000 is being expended in constructing the Panama Canal, to afford a shorter route between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts and to facilitate the commerce of the world generally.

No objection is raised to these appropriations for the purposes named. Every one of them is a worthy project and deserves not only the aid which is being extended by the Government, but should command the hearty support and indorsement of every public-spirited American citizen. However, if there are other projects of similar merit or equally essential to our public welfare they should receive equally as favorable consideration at the hands of the Government. An instance in point is the improvement of our public roads. It seems inconsistent on the part of our Government for it to expend such vast sums in improving our rivers and harbors and digging the Panama Canal in order to facilitate the handling of our commerce, and then not to take an equal interest in the improvement of the highways over which more than 50 per cent of the products which enter into this commerce must first pass. The originator of this vast volume of commerce deserves some measure of consideration.

Another fact worthy of note in this connection is that the Government has expended nearly a quarter billion in the erection of public buildings in the towns and cities throughout the United States for the convenience of our city population. This was a large and necessary expenditure, yet its benefits only reach the approximate 47 per cent of our population living in the cities. Is it any more a duty of the Government to erect buildings in the cities to accommodate their population and add to their architectural beauty than it is to help build roads over which our farmers may haul their produce with ease and profit and thus enable them to improve their farms and build more attractive homes to beautify the roadsides? It has been well said:

> Tear down every edifice in our cities and labor will rebuild them, but abandon our farms and highways and our cities will disappear forever.

The necessity for this line of work was early recognized by the passage in 1806 of an act of Congress providing an appropriation for the construction of a great national highway from Cumberland, Md., westward. Appropriations of this character continued for a number of years, finally ceasing after reaching a total of $14,000,000. At the time these appropriations were made they represented a larger proportion of the then total wealth of the United States than would similar appropriations to-day aggregating $613,000,000, which is the total cost of the great French system of highways. The census of 1850, 12 years after the last appropriation for the old Cumberland Road, placed the total wealth of the United States at $7,135,780,228, which is less than the present annual value of our farm products. It would seem, therefore, if such appropriations could be made at a time when the national exchequer was at such a low ebb, with the same principle and even greater reasons therefor now existing, that our National Government should no longer delay extending substantial aid to the cause of better roads.

Not only does it seem that these appropriations might be made, but they have been made within recent years. Not, however, for expenditure within our own territory, nor for the benefit of our citizenship, but to build roads in foreign territory. Since the War with Spain, and prior to the year 1913, there had been expended from our National Treasury for road building in Alaska $1,925,000; in Porto Rico, $2,000,000; and in the Philippine Islands, $3,000,000; making a total of $6,925,000 thus appropriated for building roads outside of the continental United States. The total of all appropriations for the Old Cumberland Road was only $6,824,919.33, so that more has been expended in recent years in these foreign possessions than was formerly spent on our famous old national pike.

Many protest against the constitutionality of national aid. Even among some Members of Congress, a pronounced doubt seems to exist as to the constitutional authority for making such appropriations of public funds. But does it seem any more appropriate or a more rigid adherence to the spirit and letter of the Constitution for our Government to make such appropriations for the benefit of an alien population than for its own citizens? There is a very wise old saying that "Charity should begin at home," and it seems eminently applicable in this connection.

The Constitution is an instrument which we all revere. It has proven an anchor of safety in many a crisis, and if our ship of state shall always be steered in obedience to its mandates, our Republic will endure unto the end of time. We would not have a single clause or principle of that great instrument perverted, even if the doors of the Treasury would thereby be opened for the much-needed improvement of our highways. It is believed, however, that ample authority exists for Federal aid without the slightest warping of the Constitution. Paragraphs 1, 3, and 7, respectively, of section 8, Article I, provides as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.
> To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.
> To establish post offices and post roads.

Either of the foregoing paragraphs is sufficiently broad to afford Congress ample authority to make appropriations for highway purposes. The "general welfare" clause, in paragraph 1, has often been invoked as authority for various kinds of internal improvements. But the question may be asked what constitutes an internal improvement? Well, in answer, it may be defined as an undertaking, promotive of the public welfare, but of such magnitude as to defy individual effort.

The power of Congress to make appropriations for this class of improvements received considerable attention at the hands of Congress at an early date. In a speech in the United States Senate in 1830, Daniel Webster referred to this power of the Government, in part, as follows:

> Under this view of things, I thought it necessary to settle, at least for myself, some definite notions with respect to the powers of the Government in regard to internal affairs, and I arrived at the conclusion that the Government had power to accomplish sundry objects or aid in their accomplishment.

The improvements of our rivers and harbors is an internal improvement on which the Government is now making lavish expenditures. In the early history of our country appropriations for roads and for rivers and harbors were classed together. The veto messages of Presidents Madison, Monroe, Jackson, and Pierce urged the same constitutional objections against appropriations for rivers and harbors as for highways. The principle involved in these two lines of work has not changed, nor have the clauses of the Constitution which authorize them been amended.

It may be claimed that river and harbor improvements, in addition to the "general-welfare" clause, find authority under the clause of the Constitution conferring upon Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States * * *," which seems inapplicable to roads. Assuming that the authority is derived from this clause, is it not also applicable to roads? In the first place, what is commerce? Webster's Dictionary defined it as "the exchange or buying and selling of commodities." If, therefore, I live on a farm 10 miles from the market, railroad station, or wharf and have $1,000 worth of produce which I wish to dispose of, at what time does that produce enter the realm of commerce? Is it when I load my wagon and drive away from the farm with it, or is it not until I shall have delivered it at the market, railroad station, or wharf? Logically my produce would be just as much articles of commerce while in transit from my farm to the point of delivery as after reaching there, and the public highway over which I might perform the haul would be just as much a route of commercial transportation as the railroads or rivers and harbors which might handle it afterwards.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, there originated along the lines of our railroads 968,464,009 tons of freight. Did the constituent commodities which entered into this freight not become articles of commerce before delivery at the railroad station? During 1910 our exports exceeded $1,700,000,000, of which 50.9 per cent was farm products, exclusive of forest products. Did the commodities represented by this vast sum not become articles of commerce until they reached the wharf for foreign shipment? Manifestly such is not the case. A commodity produced for commercial purposes becomes an article of commerce at the place of production, and it enters the channels of commerce the moment it is sold or exchanged or started in transit for sale or exchange. The vast tonnage of our railroad and water transportation routes consist largely of farm and other products originating away from the station or wharf, the initial haul being over our public roads. Therefore our public roads have just about as strong a claim on the Government, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, as do our rivers and harbors.

However, there is yet another clause of the Constitution which affords Congress this power more clearly than either of the foregoing. This is the clause conferring the power "to establish post offices and post roads." The authority granted by this clause is specific, and, inasmuch as the Government uses the public roads every day in the transportation of the mails, it would seem proper and timely for the exercise of this power. The rural delivery of mails is made each day over the public highways, the average number of miles traveled daily by rural carriers exceeding 1,000,000, or nearly one-half of all roads in the United States. Being a daily user of almost one-half of all our public roads, and the condition of these roads being so vital to efficiency and economy in the administration of the Rural Delivery Service, it would seem that the Government should take a hand in the improvement of these roads.

No country has good roads except where the general government has shared the responsibility of building and maintaining them. All of the European countries which have improved roads have acquired them under a system whereby their National Governments have borne a part of the cost and assisted in the supervision of their construction and maintenance. France is recognized as having the finest roads of any country in the world, but in the building of these roads the National Government of France contributed over $600,000,000, and supervises their maintenance to-day. Road conditions in some of the more progressive European countries are worthy of mention:

FRANCE.

France has an area of 207,054 square miles, a population (1901) of 38,962,000, and the total mileage of all public roads is 516,000 miles. This gives practically 2½ miles of road for every square mile of area and 75 people per mile of road. As compared with the United States, we have 2,200,000 miles of road, which gives an average of 0.74 mile of road per square mile of area, and a population of 41 per mile of road. On the other hand, Massachusetts has 2.15 miles of road per square mile of area and a population of 195 per mile, while Ohio has 2.18 miles of road per square mile of area and a population of 54 per mile of road.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The movement in England since 1878 has been toward the consolidation and enlargement of highway districts and the powers of the supervising officials. The first step in this movement really began in 1835, through an act of Parliament which gathered all existing statutes into one law and added certain clauses, among which was a permissive clause whereby several parishes could join together for road-administration purposes. In 1862 the highway district act was passed, which provided for the formation of highway districts consisting of several parishes and controlled by a highway board. The act was amended in minor detail in 1864.

The next act was the highway and locomotive (amendment) act of 1878. This provided for a more workable district and central authority, and provided for taking over the disturnpiked roads. One-half of the cost of main road maintenance was borne by the county and one-half by districts and parishes. Ten years later (1888) the local government act threw the care of all main roads on the county councils and abolished the old highway boards.

The last act of epoch-making importance is the development and road improvement funds act, 1909, which provides for a road board, the members to be appointed by the treasury. The board has power, with approval of the treasury, to make advances to the county councils and other highway authorities in respect to construction of new roads and the improvement of old ones. The advances may be either in form of grant or loan. The revenues are to be raised from licenses on motor vehicles and certain licenses and excises on the sale, manufacture, and import of petrol (gasoline).

SWITZERLAND.

In general, the public roads in Switzerland are divided into two main classes—cantonal roads, sometimes called State roads, and local, or communal roads. With the exception of a few intermountain and other roads of national importance, over which the National Government exercises a supervision, the cantonal roads are controlled entirely by the Cantons. The Federal supervision of these roads of national importance is largely limited to the voting of annual indemnities to the four Cantons of Grisson, Tessin, Uri, and Valais, which total about $103,000. If the special roads are not maintained in proper condition the Federal funds are withheld. The cantonal roads are generally placed under the direct charge of a highway department. Construction and maintenance are entirely supervised by this authority, while the funds are voted by cantonal government, usually under the budget system. In the new construction it is very customary for the Canton to pay a portion of the cost, while the remainder is assessed on the commune or parish. In the Canton of Vaud the proportion is 70 per cent by the State and 30 per cent by the commune. The Canton of Berne pays from 25 to 70 per cent, according to the financial condition of the commune, while the Canton of Tessin requires all new construction to be paid in full by the communes traversed. The maintenance of the cantonal roads, on the other hand, is in general, all borne by the Canton. A few Cantons require the respective communes to transport the necessary road materials from the pits or quarries to the road.

The maintenance of the cantonal or State roads is by roadmen employed throughout the year, as in France and Germany. The average length of section assigned to each man is about 3 miles. The annual salary of the cantonniers, or roadmen, varies from $150 to $200. In some Cantons the road men are also allowed the hay and pasturage along the roadside. Trees are only occasionally planted along the roadsides.

SWEDEN.

In Sweden every county is a separate community with regard to the construction and maintenance of public roads, bridges, and ferries. The county government board, appointed by the Crown, superintends the proper maintenance of the roads and bridges within the county. The orders of this board are executed by a superior sheriff (Kronofogde), deputy sheriffs (Länsmän), and assistant sheriffs (Fjerdingsmän).

The roads of the county are inspected once a year by a board consisting of the deputy sheriff and two jurors. A schedule for the inspection tour is published in advance and full records are kept of the inspection. A full report is made to the road board, and such road maintainers or road managers as are found to have defective road sections are notified, with detailed instructions of the necessary repairs. If these are not made within a specified time, fines are imposed, and the deputy sheriff may also have the work done and charge the expense to the road managers.

Until 1891 road maintenance was almost entirely "in natura," that is, by the owners or tillers of the soil. Now an additional revenue is raised from other taxable property than land, which constitutes a so-called "road fund."

The roads are divided into road districts, which are in turn divided into allotments to be maintained "in natura." These allotments are changed from time to time by the county government, but only on substantial evidence showing the need of such change. The road fund is distributed to the various allotments and for the district in general in a somewhat complicated manner by a board or committee in which both the county and district have a voice.

The Royal Board of Road Building and Water Works (Kongl. Vag-Och Vattenbygnadstyrelsen) has supervisory and advisory powers in matters concerning road construction, railorads, harbors, etc. This board is composed of officers who, besides being graduates in their departments at the Technical High School, have also passed a military course in the fortification corps in the army.

In maintenance the Federal Government contributes to the road fund a sum equal to 15 per cent of the total cost, while in new construction the Government pays two-thirds and the road district one-third. The method of handling the funds and carrying out the work of construction is very similar to that already described for maintenance.

Great progress is being made in this country in the work of road improvement through the efforts of the States and local governmental units, but the progress being attained is not as great as the importance of this question should justify. In order to accelerate this progress our National Government, following the example set by the national Governments of the progressive European countries, should lend its aid. Agitation looking to this end has been going on for a number of years, and a strong sentiment exists throughout the country in favor of such action. Not only this, but the number of bills which have been introduced in both Houses of Congress providing for some system of national aid indicates that a strong sentiment exists in Congress for participation in this work. Therefore it behooves this Congress to take some definite action looking to this end as soon as a definite and wise policy can be agreed upon.

For my own part, I think that the form of national aid which should be adopted should be of such character as will bring about a wholesome cooperation between the National, State, and local governments. In order to facilitate the administration of such a measure, the State should be the smallest unit with which the National Government would deal; but I think that through the State local government units should be included and required to share in the expense and responsibility incident to the carrying forward of the work. To this end, some scheme whereby there would be an equal division of cost between the National, the State, and the local governmental units should be adopted.

To my mind, the bill which most nearly embodies this idea among those which have been introduced in Congress is House bill 7617. This bill provides for an annual appropriation of $25,000,000, to be distributed among the different States on the basis of State units, population, and mileage of star and rural delivery routes. Under the provisions of this bill $65,000 would be distributed to each of the several States, one-half of the remainder to each State in the ratio which its population shall bear to the total population of the United States and the remaining one-half among the States at the ratio which the mileage of star routes and rural delivery routes in each State shall bear to the total mileage of star routes and rural delivery routes in the United States.

This bill also makes the State the smallest unit with which the National Government would deal, dealings with the smaller units to be by the State authorities. The administration of the bill, so far as the National Government is concerned, is vested in the Department of Agriculture.

This department has done a great work in developing the widespread sentiment for better highways which now exists and has an efficient organization which can and should be utilized to further advantage by vesting in it the administration of such legislation as Congress may enact for the participation of the National Government in highway work. This is provided for in House bill 7617.

Mr. Chairman, I earnestly hope the pending bill will receive the approval of this House.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. HERNANDEZ].

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the few minutes that have been allotted to me I will not undertake to discuss this measure with the very eloquent men who have taken part in this discussion. I will content myself, however, in saying that I am heartily in favor of it, because I think, as has been said here, it is a beneficial piece of legislation for the people at large. We are legislating here for all the people. I heard the word "paternalism" used in connection with this measure. As I understand the word "paternalism," it means paternal aid to any community. Some of these gentlemen are laboring under the apprehension they are going to build roads for the farmers of the West or the Southwest or the Middle States. This apprehension, Mr. Chairman, is a very small one when you go and compare it with the amounts that the various States have already appropriated and are spending upon their public roads. Why, the small State of New Mexico is spending to-day at the rate of $1,000,000 a year on its public highways. We have constructed between 300 and 400 miles of roads in the last year. When they think they will not profit by means of these roads they are mistaken. Why, I have seen people traveling in automobiles from here down to the Pacific coast. I happened to be down there last winter and I saw people from Buffalo, N. Y., down on the coast who had gone across all of those States and across the States of New Mexico and Arizona. Everybody is benefited by good roads. Our last legislature in New Mexico made an appropriation, or, rather, approved the issue of half a million dollars in bonds for the purpose of good-roads construction. According to the terms of this bill we will get $155,000 out of the amount appropriated.

If this measure is enacted into law, it will be thankfully received, and the money will be properly used. I will also say here that in my State we are properly equipped. We have a State roads commission, composed of our governor, the commissioner of public lands, and of our State engineer, and they are an efficient board, who will see to it that these funds are not used on some cow trail or anything of that sort; and I am sure that the majority of the Members of this House have the same confidence that I have in the integrity and efficiency of their public officials. Let us be charitable and have confidence in a public official until he proves that he is unworthy of that confidence. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask permission to have my further remarks extended in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Mr. Chairman, in speaking of the roads and the improvements that are being made, I would like to show within the few minutes allotted to me the conditions of the highway department in New Mexico and what they have done toward the betterment of roads in my State.

The Thirty-sixth Legislative Assembly of New Mexico, recognizing the importance to the entire public of good roads and permanent road building, established a public highway known as El Camino Real, to traverse the most important counties from the border of Colorado at Raton, Colfax County, to the Texas border south of Las Cruces, in Dona Ana County, and while still a Territory attempted some improvement on the line of roads for the purpose of a main highway, but prior to 1912 no great progress had been made in improving the possibilities of traffic from county to county. Until New Mexico acquired the dignity of statehood the lack of funds and any central or State organization prevented effective work. Since 1912 the progress has been marked, and so great is the appreciation of the work being done that the State, county, and precinct authorities are now working in complete harmony to the great advantage of the entire State.

New Mexico has more to contend with than most States of the Union in constructing and maintaining roads.

It has an area larger than many of the States more densely populated. Its populated areas are far apart; its available funds smaller than any other State in proportion to the miles of road necessary to afford proper facilities for overland transportations; its rainfall torrential at times and destructive to the very best road construction; its geological conditions so varied as to present innumerable problems of construction and maintenance; good road materials are not always available within any reasonable distance, and cost prevents the consideration of imported materials; long stretches of deep sand, miles of heavy rock work, valleys, mountains, table lands, precipitation varying from 8 to 30 inches, and watercourses as uncertain as the floating clouds, all make the work of good road building both difficult and expensive; but the people of New Mexico have worked with the determination to succeed, and it is not too much to claim that for its population, taxable wealth, and mileage New Mexico is fully abreast with the most progressive State in the Union.

In my State there are now 4,000 miles of main State and intercounty highways, and there was expended on these roads in 1915, $550,000. In 1915 there were 350 miles of new roads constructed, and there will be expended upon the State and county roads in 1916 the sum of $1,250,000, and I estimate that about 700 miles more road will be built this year.

The Forest Service has also very substantially assisted in the building of roads in my State.

During the year 1915 from the 25 per cent of the gross receipts earned by the Forest Service the road fund, or rather the highway commission, received from the Forest Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, the sum of $16,871.75; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, there is available for the highway commission for the year 1916 the sum of $15,893.23.

For roads and trails and for the benefit of the public there is a further 10 per cent added, which, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and available in 1915, amounted to $13.497.40, and for the current year there will be available for the same purpose the sum of $12,714.58.

In giving you these figures I am trying to show you that the people of New Mexico have not been idle, but have done as much for the benefit of their roads and the public at large as any of the more populous States with very much more money to handle the great work than New Mexico has ever had.

The $65,000, being the specific amount to be turned over to the State, will not go very far in the great work that we are doing, but if we should be entitled to the total amount of aid, namely, $155,802, as proposed in the bill, our State will prove to you that the work that we can and will accomplish will be equal to that done by any other State in the Union.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, of course this is a very elaborate question. It is a very interesting question, and it is also a very important question. I have listened with much interest to the various Members as they have given their views upon the subject, and the first one that meets my view is the division of this $25,000,000. Some think a more equitable distribution could be made of this money. I will fully explain my position on that feature of the bill under consideration.

Mr. Chairman, this bill undertakes to aid the States in the construction of its public highways. It appropriates the sum of $25,000,000, from which amount $65,000 is to be paid in bulk to each State, large or small. The balance is then divided into two portions. One portion is to be distributed among all the States according to their population and the other portion is to be divided among all the States according to the number of miles of the highways used for mail delivery and star-route roads. In this estimate the population of Michigan is fixed at 2,810,173, and the number of miles of highway in Michigan for this allotment is fixed at 46,236 miles. The amount of Federal aid apportioned to Michigan under this bill is estimated at $850,492. Before this amount is available, however, a like sum must be used by the State in the construction of its public highways. The class of roads that may participate in this appropriation includes earth, sand-clay, sand-gravel, and other common types of roads, as well as roads of higher classes, one of the purposes of the act being to encourage and promote the improvement of a general system of roads leading from cities, towns, and railway stations into the adjacent farming community.

The roads are to be constructed under the supervision of the State highway department of the State wherein the road is constructed, and reports of the character of the highway and its completion are to be made to the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States. This money may also be used for the maintenance of the highway as well as for its construction, and the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, from time to time make payments upon the construction or maintenance as the same progresses, but not, however, exceeding the prorata part to be paid by the United States for the value of labor and material put into such construction and maintenance. The work is to be carried on under the supervision of the State highway commissioner, who reports to the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, and all payments of money shall be made by the Treasurer of the United States upon the warrant of the Secretary of Agriculture.

EQUITABLE DIVISION OF THE FUND.

It is thought by some that making a payment of $65,000 flat equally to each State is not just. That the State of Rhode Island, with a population of a little over half a million and about 1,000 miles of highway, ought not to receive $65,000 of the appropriation, while New York, with a population of over 10,000,000 and over 48,000 miles of highway, is to receive only a like amount. While this amount was fixed arbitrarily by the committee, I think that the distribution of this equal amount can not be regarded as wholly unfair. A mile of highway in one State costs as much to construct and maintain as a mile of highway in any other State. It is as useful and beneficial and serviceable in one State as in another. This $65,000 apportioned to each State will construct possibly 5 miles of highway or less, and there is no State that can not use this amount in the construction of its highways to good advantage. Indeed, the amount of appropriation to each State under this act can be profitably utilized in the maintenance of the highways in all the States.

THIS MONEY WILL BE WELL EXPENDED.

We spent $400,000,000 for the construction of the Panama Canal, largely in the interest of commerce and transportation. When our country was new millions of acres of our choicest farming land, now of great value, were donated to the construction of railroads, canals, and highways in the interest of commerce and transportation and the general welfare of the Republic. Large appropriations are made annually for the construction of imposing Federal buildings throughout the land, and for the improvement of rivers and harbors in the interest of commerce and transportation, but the commerce of the entire country starts in the rural sections and from the farm, and no more beneficial appropriation, whether in the interest of commerce or the welfare and prosperity of the people, can be made than a reasonable appropriation for public highways.

MERCHANT MARINE.

Much is being said now about the desirability, the benefit, and the need of a merchant marine. We are all in favor of an American merchant marine to aid in our commerce, and surely it would be of great benefit to the industries of our country, whether that industry be of manufacturing or that of the farm. Our country's welfare depends upon agriculture, manufacturing, and commerce. The products of the soil are estimated at $9,000,000,000 annually. This is stated as their value at the farm, while the estimate is made that the cost to the consumer of these products is $27,000,000,000. Largely entering into the increased cost of farm products is the cost of transportation, and I was interested yesterday in the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE], when he states that the cost of transportation per ton-mile of these products from the farm to the market was practically 23 cents on poor roads, while a ton could be moved a mile on good roads for one-third of this amount, or about 7 cents per mile per ton. When we consider that the products of the farm run up into the billions of tons per annum it is easy to see the vast saving good roads are to the farmer, the loss being estimated at $228,000,000. May I say that but for agriculture our country would, indeed, be in a most deplorable, wretched, and impoverished condition. Let each farmer sit down and estimate the number of tons he markets each year, and the distance from his farm to the market, and what the saving would amount to each year if he could draw his products for 7 cents per mile per ton instead of it costing him 23 cents per ton a mile, and he will readily see the profit in good roads.

GOOD ROADS ARE FAVORED BY ALL THE PEOPLE.

The most important attribute of the State or Nation is its highways. The early highways of the States were its first concern. Without highways our rural communities would be practically shut off not only from the markets, but from civilization as well.

The highways were first constructed by the woodsmen, by those living in rural communities and with taxes levied on county, township, and farms. The hardy pioneer settlers cleared the country, beautified it by their handiwork, erected the country's schoolhouses, churches, and left an enduring monument of their handiwork in the construction of a network of highways which make accessible the remote parts of our country. They are gone, but these monuments remain for our use, our benefit, and our comfort. The welfare, prosperity, and happiness of all the people, not alone for those living in the country or the city or the villages, but for the people as a whole. Times have changed along with conditions. To-day the automobile has transplanted the horse on the highway and motor power is fast taking his place in doing the drawing and hauling. These advances are calling for better highways and are being met with a hearty response by the people in the country and cities. In fact, a person is hardly called an up-to-date farmer if he does not now have an automobile with which in a few minutes or hours at the furthest he can go to town, secure repairs for his machinery, do his trading or banking, and return. At first there was a strong prejudice against the auto by the farmer. They frightened his teams, he saw them used only by those having leisure on their hands and largely for pleasure. He could see that they cut up and destroyed his dirt highways. And it was not believed by him that they would ever become a necessary utility for carrying on his business. But with the coming of the Ford this has all changed. Every farmer now has his auto. This he uses for commercial business as well as for pleasure. The auto has passed from the stage of luxury to that of necessity. But with the small car has also come the great 60-horsepower passenger. Most will admit that the larger cars are owned in the city. Most will admit that the larger cars are the most severe on the highways.

There is no question but that is takes a good highway to stand up under the larger cars of to-day, and a dirt highway in wet weather is soon cut up and greatly injured by them. Most people living in the city use their cars for country travel, and I think they are willing, without complaint, to help construct and maintain country highways and will be in favor of Federal aid for the construction and maintenance of better roads. The estimated wealth of the United States is $150,000,000,000. No one would care to figure out the infinitesimal part this appropriation of $25,000,000 bears to that great sum. The wealth, the progress, and the prosperity of our country is so dependent upon our public highways that to deny the one is but to injure the other.

WASHINGTON CITY.

Who is there of you, my colleagues, who did not when he first came to this beautiful city of Washington, our National Capital, thrill with pride on seeing its beautiful public buildings, magnificent parks, and fine statues of our great men? But am I wrong in saying that you were equally or more impressed by its splendidly constructed streets and pavements? They are smooth as the typical barn floor and radiate in all directions and into every quarter of the city. They are permanently built of asphalt, and testify to the foresight and wisdom of their constructors. They were constructed at great cost, but there is no one to-day that would have them removed or destroyed for many times their cost.

FEDERAL AID.

Much has been said about Federal aid for the construction of highways. The claim is made that it has never been the policy of the National Government to lend its aid for this purpose, and the Cumberland Road is mentioned as the only road in which the Government participated in its construction. I might say, in passing, that the Sixty-second Congress appropriated $500,000 for this purpose. This sum was to be divided among the States according to population and miles of highway. None of it ever reached Michigan or many of the other States, for the reason that the States failed to qualify or conform to the provisions of the act. But this appropriation of $500,000 did not go unused. It was used in the State of Ohio, which seemed to fall within the provisions of the act.

MICHIGAN TERRITORIAL HIGHWAY.

In the year 1825 the President of the United States, John Quincy Adams, was authorized to appoint commissioners to survey and mark a road from Detroit to Chicago. Three thousand dollars was appropriated for laying out the road. In 1827 Congress appropriated the sum of $20,000 to aid in the construction of this road, and the act provided that the whole sum could be expended within the Territory of Michigan. The road from Detroit to Chicago was designed to open up the West and make available the rich agricultural lands through that unbroken wilderness. And this road was also deemed important for the purpose of transporting munitions of war, provisions, and troops to points farther west. This is one of the reasons urged for making this appropriation 90 years after, and one of the benefits of the country should it ever be needed therefor. This highway had the efforts of Gen. Lewis Cass, and the road was located to be 100 feet wide between Detroit and Chicago; but the exhaustion of the appropriation made impossible the execution of the plan, and a highway following the Indian trail over which traveled those intrepid adventurers and explorers—Nicolet, first; then Marquette, La Salle, Joliet, Tonti, and other early missionaries, bearing the Christian cross. In 1832 the work on this great road was recommenced and completed thereafter. The bill for the Detroit and Chicago road passed the House February 2, 1825, and the Senate on March 2, 1825. It was signed by the President, and became a law on the last day of the session. It was fathered by Father Richard, who was a Delegate from the Territory of Michigan, entitled only to sit and have a voice, but had no vote thereon. Michigan Avenue in the city of Detroit and Michigan Avenue in Chicago are laid out along this route. It traversed a splendid country, and the modern cities and towns of Wayne, Ypsilanti, Ann Arbor, Chelsea, Jackson, Albion, Marshall, Battle Creek, Augusta, Galesburg, Kalamazoo, and Paw Paw, in Michigan, mark its trail.

The Legislature of Michigan of 1913 have designated this route a trunk line, and to-day the people of the State of Michigan and the counties and cities through which it passes are interested in constructing this Territorial highway laid out by the United States into a paved national highway, and before one century shall have rolled around from the laying out of this highway there is no question but what it will be transformed into a permanent and magnificent and useful paved highway, and practically along the same route. The people of Michigan are awake to the importance of good roads; they are also constructing a trunk line from Detroit to Lake Michigan through Lansing and Grand Rapids, and in a recent letter from the State highway commissioner of Michigan he says:

I feel quite safe in saying that no highway laws in any other State has resulted in producing so many miles of improved roads at so small a cost within 10 years after its enactment as the Michigan highway law.

Michigan has already built and completed 3,765 miles of roads, which have been accepted by the State, which will be increased to 4,000 miles at the close of the fiscal year, June 30. The Michigan law has most of the salient features of the present act, and under the able management of our highway commissioner great progress is being made in the construction of its highways.

Much might be said about the evolution of our public highways and their construction. The construction of good highways dates back centuries before the Christian era. The evolution from the ox cart to the locomotive and from the prairie schooner to the limousine has been no more rapid than that from the windmill to the electric current. Good roads bring people, communities, and their affairs together. They are necessary and consequential to our advancement and our prosperity, and, as stated here on the floor of the House, by a careful study of the past in road building may we find the path of our prosperity for the future. We are getting used to better things, and let poor roads go with the log cabin. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I shall support this bill. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY].

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a short editorial on "Peace and the people," from the San Francisco Chronicle of January 6, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask upon what subject?

Mr. CALLAWAY. On "Peace and the people—commercial organizations of America prefer law to war and warlike preparations."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I yield back the balance of my time.

The article referred to is as follows:

PEACE AND THE PEOPLE—COMMERCIAL ORGANIZATIONS OF AMERICA PREFER LAW TO WAR AND WARLIKE PREPARATION.

The people back home are against the entire preparedness plan, says Representative SHERWOOD, of Ohio, who of all men can not be classed by the militarists as a coward. He fought in 42 battles of the Civil War, left the Army a general, and now, at the ripe age of 80, is ready to reenlist if danger threatens his country. Unable to see any signs of such danger, he describes the preparedness agitation as the engineering of "armament makers and militarists."

Here is a man who can not be opposed to universal and compulsory military service because he is afraid of being called to the colors. His age, his record, and his willingness to go into the trenches, if necessary, are sufficient reply to those who stigmatize all advocates of peace as cowards.

It is a cowardly charge, and for the simple reason that excessive preparedness is more the policy of the craven than of the courageous. The apostles of peace may be mistaken, but they are surely less afraid than those who would sacrifice the freedom of this Nation on the altar of conscription. If the question of bravery is involved in the merits of the controversy, the decision must go hard against those who see in every European and Asiatic army a possible invader of America.

But it is not a matter of courage and is solely one of common sense, and this latter scorns the fear of attack by any one or more of the crippled armies of Europe.

And it is not only the people back home who are against preparedness. The commercial organizations throughout the country are overwhelmingly opposed to militarism and strongly in favor of the settlement of international disputes by judicial tribunals. The vote taken by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States shows a very small percentage of business men who prefer preparedness to conciliation and military to economic pressure on nations resorting to war. The great majority pin their faith to law as arbiter of disputes and to economic forces as the influence with which to restrain the militaristic nations.

It is an instructive return, because it evidences the comforting truth that the armament makers and all others financially interested in preparedness are but a small fraction of the business men of America.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS]. [Applause.]

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I will not enter into any general discussion of the merits of this bill for the want of time. It seems to be conceded that good roads will be of great benefit to the country and to the farming communities. It would seem idle to take any time in a discussion of that branch of the subject. Those who have spoken in opposition to the bill have not taken the position that it will not be beneficial to the country districts in general. The principal objection to this bill, judging from what those who have spoken against it have said, is a kind of feeling or opposition arising in the cities because no portion of the money which will be expended will be applied to the construction of streets or roads within corporate limits of cities in excess of 2,000 inhabitants, except under certain conditions. This is the point to which I wish to address my remarks in answer to the position taken by those gentlemen representing urban districts and who are opposed to the proposition because they say it will be a burden upon the city for the benefit of the country.

In my capacity of Congressman at Large from the State of Illinois I represent both urban and rural communities—both city and country—and believe that I am in as good a position as any Member here to judge accurately of the benefits that will accrue to the whole country in common if this bill shall become a law. In my State is the finest expanse of agricultural lands in America, and within her borders is the second city in population and in some respects the greatest city on the continent.

The thought I have in mind is this: Every city is dependent upon the country, and whether it be New York City, to which city the whole country contributes, or whether it be Chicago, to which the great Central West contributes, or whether it be the county seat, to which the county contributes, the growth, the development, and the wealth of every city in the land depend upon the prosperity and the development of the territory contributory to that city. [Applause.] I have heard criticism of the bill because of the fact that it was limited in its operation to towns of under 2,000 inhabitants. I happen to live in a town larger than that, a very prosperous county seat. I am sure that the people of the community in which I live find no fault with this proposition or because no money will be expended on the streets within our corporate limits. We have in my county a number of hard roads leading into the county seat. The business men of the city of Pittsfield, in which I live, have contributed by donation largely to the construction of all these roads. I myself have contributed, and we are willing out of our own pockets individually to raise funds to build up the roads which lead into our city. We are perfectly willing that the Federal Government shall substitute itself and assist in the construction of these highways, because we know that on the development of the surrounding country, extending out to the limits of the county, and on the prosperity of the rural districts depend the prosperity, growth, and development of the county seat.

I want to say this about the roads of Illinois: Some one yesterday, I believe it was the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], criticized the Illinois roads. I was surprised and a little pained that one of my colleagues had to come to his feet and admit that the roads in Illinois were among the poorest of all the States of the Union. There are two reasons for this, if it is true. We have more roads than many sections of the country where topographical conditions are different than they are in the State of Illinois. We have a road on almost every section line. But the chief trouble with good roads in the State of Illinois lies in the character of our soil.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Can I have five minutes more?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I have not the time.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Three, then.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. The character of our soil consists of prairie black loam, and I may say that during certain seasons of the year we have the best dirt roads in the country, and then there are seasons in the year in which we have the very worst dirt roads in the country. But the reason why we have not developed roads in Illinois lies largely in the fact of the inaccessibility of road material. It may be 100 miles, and is in many places, to the nearest material that can be used for road building. The farmers and the local authorities can not go to a neighboring gravel bed and secure the material. They have to transport their cement and other materials over the railroads and then cart it into the country where it is to be used for this purpose. These are the reasons why we have not better roads in the State of Illinois. And it is only within the last two or three years that we have undertaken by means of State aid to build good roads there. We now have a law by which the State contributes one-half. We have a State highway commission; we have a State road engineer. Roads have to be built, under the direction of the highway commission, of the material which the State highway commission shall prescribe, and the State contributes one-half to the construction of those roads. When constructed the State takes them over and maintains them for all time.

We are entering upon an era of good roads in Illinois, and I will say to my friends in the East and those in the West who traverse the State of Illinois along the great national highways that they will in the near future, I apprehend, have less occasion to criticize our roads than at present. We realize that of all the great international highways from the East to the West, from coast to coast, four-fifths of them cross the State of Illinois. All of them projected north of the mouth of the Ohio River must of necessity cross the State of Illinois. We are contributing our share and will in the future do so, and I think it is not unfair, I think it is only proper, when this Government, in all its liberality, and I may say oftentimes its prodigality, in appropriating millions for various public purposes which go into the urban centers and upon our rivers and harbors, that a small proportion in the sum authorized in this bill should be appropriated to the construction of highways in the States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE].

Mr. LEE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is not usually fruitful to discuss bills of this character in the Committee of the Whole in general debate; but, being friendly to the object of this legislation, I think it is my duty to point out what I think to be fallacies and imperfections in this bill as it now stands. We should be prepared when we come into the Committee of the Whole, under the 5-minute rule, to drastically amend it.

That this bill is intended all right is perhaps true. It seems that while this piece of legislation is covered with good intentions, like the road leading to ruin or that other road running to Chicago are "paved with good intentions," good intentions will not carry it through.

The bill we have before us has been extolled by many gentlemen as a bill for the purpose of building and maintaining rural roads, thereby lightening the loads from the farm to the market. If that is the purpose of the bill, it must be amended. Otherwise it will be subject to the provisions of the pure-food law and the penalties for misbranding, because this bill is not for the purpose of building or maintaining a road from the farm to the market. It does not say so, and it does not give you the right to say so.

There are three or four features of the bill I desire to discuss. The first is that it is not a farmers' bill. It is a bill fathered by the automobilists. But I do not find any fault with it on that ground. Maybe it is better on that account. But the bill is not to be controlled in the interests of the rural roads. The bill is drawn so that every dollar of every appropriation in every State can be expended under the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture within the limits of the metropolises of the several States. I have called attention to that fact before, and I call it to your attention again. It says:

That for the purposes of this act the term "rural post road" shall be held to mean any public road over which rural mail is, or might be, carried outside of incorporated cities, towns, and boroughs having a population exceeding 2,000 and in said cities, towns, and boroughs having a population exceeding 2,000 along streets and roads where the houses average more than 200 feet apart.

Now, we will cite Chicago. Within the city of Chicago, beginning at its outer limit, there may be consecutive miles selected where the average distance between the houses is more than 200 feet. I will not say that the Secretary of Agriculture would, in the beginning, favor placing all the expenditures within the metropolitan limits. I do say he is given the power to place them there. That would give the people who live in the metropolis a potent force in saying where, if not within their city limits, that money will be expended. The result will be—as I think this bill intends it to be—that the roads will be constructed under State control. They will be simply State roads running across the State, to become connecting links with great interstate systems. With that I am not at war. But that is not what we have heard explained here as the purpose of the bill, and frankness to the public demands that we say so or amend the bill to conform with the other view.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. SLOAN. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. POWERS. I am in sympathy with the purposes of this legislation, but there are a good many features connected with it that I do not approve of. Is it not true that under the provisions of this bill the State highway department of any State, if it is a Republican State and they desire to do it, could have an improvement of roads exclusively in the Republican part of the State, and in a Democratic State they could do exactly the same thing?

Mr. SLOAN. Certainly; and the Secretary of Agriculture, be he Republican or Democrat, can say to the Representatives of a State of the opposing party, "If you desire to have a million-dollar improvement of roads in your State, I will cause to be contributed only 30 per cent, or $300,000, while that State must contribute $700,000, while in a favored State for a million-dollar improvement this Government will require the State to put up only $500,000.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; briefly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that whether the Secretary gives 30 per cent or 50 per cent on a particular road, it does not increase or decrease the amount that will be expended within that State for that year.

Mr. SLOAN. Within the discretion lodged with the Secretary of Agriculture, it authorizes him to say for every $3 the Government puts up the State must pay up $7, and if your annual quota is one-half million, as it is in Nebraska, under this bill to get all of it and prevent it lapsing back into the United States Treasury you must invest $1,166,666.66, while your neighbor State to obtain similar result must invest only $500,000. I ask the chairman of this committee to read his own bill, because there is nothing in the bill that requires the expenditure of all the apportionment to the State. The Secretary can use his political power under this bill to say to the governor of a State, "If you want a million-dollar appropriation for improvement in your State, you must put up $700,000 and I will put up only $300,000." In another State, "If you want a million-dollar improvement, put up $500,000 and we will put up the other $500,000." That is the meaning of this bill.

Authority has been cited for the establishment of post roads. We find it in the Constitution. We find that it has been the subject of legislation. However, I do not know that we have any precedent in all the history of our country in the establishment of post roads where, when immediately upon the establishment through the funds of the Government, that that post road should be abandoned and jurisdiction over it absolutely surrendered.

That is one of the most serious vices of this proposed legislation. In this legislation we are not supposed to be representing our States in their sovereign capacities. Gentlemen at the other end of this Capitol will do that. We are supposed to represent the sovereignty of this Union and to look after the expenditures from the Treasury of this Union. Yet the effect of this bill is to demand of the Treasury from 30 per cent to 50 per cent contributions for the establishment and maintenance of roads, and immediately the Government's investment is complete in those roads the sovereignty is surrendered. When the money is invested, and within 30 seconds after the establishment of the road, the State can dislocate, relocate, or discontinue that road and destroy it. Under the terms of this bill there is not a condition which would require that State to respond either in forfeiture or in damages in any way or to any extent for lapse of that road.

The question was asked the other day what was the difference between this bill and the bill that was voted for in the last Congress. A large difference was this: Under the bill in the Sixty-third Congress there was to be an election of procedures. One where the Secretary of Agriculture should cooperate with the road-building authorities of the State. In that case there was no prohibition of the Government, after investing its money, proceeding to cooperate with the State in the maintenance and control of the highway so established.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman says the bill of last year provided that the Government should cooperate in maintaining the road?

Mr. SLOAN. Cooperate in its building; yes. In not saying that the complete control and jurisdiction should be given to the State it left the clear implication that who establishes shall enjoy and control.

The reason you left the election between that cooperation in building and control and the so-called leasing system which was the subject of choice was because you wanted the Government to contribute money to the construction of the road, but you did not want the Government to have any control.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Let us see if I understand the gentleman. Does he claim that under last year's bill the Government had control over the roads that it aided?

Mr. SLOAN. It would have if they elected under section 3 of last year's bill, but under section 4 of the same bill, which was the leasing section, it would not, and the reason is well understood by the gentleman from Virginia. It was in obedience to that doctrine which stands ready to receive money from the Government but refuses to give the Government any jurisdiction or control over the result of the expenditure of that money. To be perfectly plain, it is the ultra State-rights idea, that is ever willing and ready to put its hands into the Treasury of the United States and obtain money, but not willing to cooperate with the Government thereafter or permit the Government to have anything to say in the matter of the control. That is why the leasing proposition was submitted in the bill the last time. That system provided, not that the Government should cooperate in the building of the road, but that after the road was built, not as a matter of encouragement, but as a matter of reward, for a road of the highest class there should be paid $60 per mile, for a road of the second class $30 per mile, and for a road of the third class $15 per mile. Under the present bill after the Government invests $500,000 of its money in a million-dollar enterprise in any of the States, then this is how it will be disposed of. Page 4 of the bill provides—

That all construction and maintenance of roads under the provisions of this act shall be under the supervision and control of the State highway departments of the several States.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. The gentleman has stated his contention that the Government surrenders control over this road.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It does not surrender it. It never exercises it.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. But the only part the Government has in it is to contribute to its construction.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. What is the particular objection to the State retaining jurisdiction and control over Government-aided roads and being responsible thereafter for their maintenance?

Mr. SLOAN. There would not be any objection if what is implied in your question was a fact; but the government of the State is not responsible to the Government of the United States for the maintenance of the road under this bill. That is one of the imperfections I want to see amended. It should be if a road be established that road should continue forever under joint control of State and Nation, or if the Government should see fit to surrender a measure of control after the road was completed and the State failed, neglected, or refused to maintain that road properly, it should forfeit to the Government of the United States such sum or sums as should be fixed by this Congress, collected under the direction of the Secretary.

Another serious objection to this bill is the provision practically compelling the States of the Union to adopt a highway commission or forfeit large sums of money. The Constitution and laws of the United States guarantee to the States protection in their republican form of government, which is commonly construed to mean a representative form of government. Further, it will not abide a State departing from such government. Yet now it proposes to force upon a State a commission, usually non-elective, and refuses to permit the Federal authority to continue to deal with the governor, elected by and responsible to the people.

I trust that the real friends of this legislation will see that proper amendments are made to this proposed law, the virtue of whose purpose is staggering under the weight of its crudities, imperfections, injustices, and unwarrantable grant of power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DUNN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP].

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read a resolution passed by the Legislature of Virginia on this subject of good-roads legislation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Congress of the United States has for many years, and is now, making enormous appropriations of money for the improvement of our waterways and harbors and in the erection of public buildings; and

Whereas the great masses of the people of the State of Virginia and of the United States are deeply interested in the building and maintenance of our public highways; and

Whereas there is now pending in the House of Representatives of the United States a bill, which has been duly reported and on the calendar of that body, appropriating the sum of $25,000,000, and of that amount giving to the State of Virginia the sum of $591,214 for the purpose of the building of roads in the State of Virginia; and

Whereas this bill is of the most vital importance to the people of Virginia: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Delegates of Virginia (the Senate concurring), That the Members of the Virginia delegation in the Congress of the United States in both Houses be, and they are hereby, requested to support the aforesaid bill, or any similar measure, which will give the people of Virginia Federal aid in the construction of its public roads, and the clerk of this body is hereby directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to each of the Senators and to each of the Members of the House of Representatives from Virginia forthwith after its adoption.

Agreed to by house of delegates January 19, 1916.

J. W. WILLIAMS, Clerk.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, the resolution just read was introduced in the Virginia House of Delegates by Hon. M. K. Lowry, and was unanimously adopted by the Legislature of Virginia. It expresses the attitude of the people of the State of Virginia on the subject of Federal aid to roads. With the resolution and with the bill before the House I most heartily sympathize. It should have the support of every Member who desires to pass legislation in the interest of the rural communities. The opponents of the bill have not advanced a single argument to support their contentions that could not with equal propriety be advanced against any Federal appropriation for any internal improvement whatever. While there is a demand for appropriation of money out of the Federal Treasury from many sources, the present bill would probably benefit a larger number of people than an appropriation of a similar amount for any other purpose of internal improvement. The bill has been very carefully drawn, has the support of both Democrats and Republicans of the Roads Committee, and has the indorsement of the good roads organizations throughout the Union. It is a crystallization of the best thought of the best minds given to road legislation, and is entitled to the best consideration of the membership of this House. I have at other times given my reasons for supporting similar bills before the House, and I will not now consume the time of the House by repeating them. The bill will have my best support.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to my friend from Missouri, chairman of the committee, that this is Saturday afternoon, and we have had a long and hard week's work.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois has been so exceedingly kind, considerate, and helpful that I am constrained to act upon his suggestion, and I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BORLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7617, to encourage the building of good roads, and had directed him to report that they had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KONOP, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for 10 days, on account of illness in his family.

MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE GOULDEN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to remind Members that memorial services will be held in the House to-morrow on the life, character, and public services of the late Representative JOSEPH A. GOULDEN.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Sunday, January 23, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, submitting an amendment to last subparagraph of Navy Department's letter of December 16, 1915, to include U. S. S. Virginia (H. Doc. No. 612); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting list of documents and files of papers which are not needed or useful in the transaction of current business of the department and have no permanent value or historical interest (H. Doc. No. 613); to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, January 23, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. FITZGERALD as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our hearts turn to Thee, our Father in heaven, as we assemble here to-day in memory of a deceased Member of this House whose life and public services challenge the admiration of all who knew him. As a young man in his teens he answered the call of President Lincoln for volunteers to preserve the integrity of the Union, and proved himself a brave and gallant soldier on many a field of battle. When the war was over he returned to his home and took up the life of a civilian and made himself a worthy and valuable citizen. Wherever he was called, in city, State, or Nation, he served with distinction. His genial character, splendid personality, and generous impulses made him a favorite. Here on the floor of this House, where he served for many years, he was noted for his fidelity and efficiency, a consistent member of his chosen church. Long may his memory live and inspire others to emulate his virtues. Be Thou a comfort to those who knew him best, especially to the members of his immediate family, that they may look forward with hope in the blessed promise of the life immortal, through Him who taught us the continuity of that life and illustrated in the glorious resurrection. Amen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Journal. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE GOULDEN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr BENNET, by unanimous consent, Ordered, That Sunday, January 23, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon, be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York offers a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 101.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity be given for tribute to the memory of Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, late a Member of this House from the State of New York.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That at the conclusion of to-day's proceedings the House, as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, do stand adjourned.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, when the Sixty-fourth Congress convened, Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN failed to answer to his name because on May 3, 1915, he had responded to the final roll call of the Supreme Ruler of the Universe. When I recall his efficient and faithful service and glorious record of splendid legislative achievement and then take a retrospective of his noble character as a man in private life, I consider that this House does great honor to itself by convening to-day, in compliance with its time-honored custom, to memorialize our lamented colleague. It is the most sacred privilege which can come to me as a heritage of his friendship that, as an evidence of my gratitude to him, and in sincere appreciation of his loyalty and devotion, I am permitted to participate in these exercises.

Friendship is the rarest and sweetest flower that grows in the garden of life; its soil is the human heart; it is planted by honest thought, nurtured by tears of sympathy, and kept alive by the breath of good wishes. Any one who possessed the friendship of Col. GOULDEN, and they were legion, might have applied the acid tests of a chattering tongue, a wind of adversity, a bit of good fortune, or a breath of slander, only to find that it was untarnished by any or all. It was pure gold. And so it is of the man as I knew him to be that I desire to speak this afternoon, with apologies for making my remarks more personal than might seem prudent.

When I had been elected a Member of this House, with that disinterested eagerness and courteous solicitude which characterized Col. GOULDEN as a kindly man of distinctive paternal tendencies, especially thoughtful and considerate of the young man entering upon a public career with little experience to his credit, he sought me out, as an intimate acquaintance of the younger members of family, and bestowed upon me his gracious and esteemed favor.

It was at his earnest insistence that I came to Washington as his guest at the opening of the final session of the last Congress, to serve what he termed "an apprenticeship," and until the Christmas recess I shared his company daily, attending each session of the House at his behest, where, although a man of a quiet and retiring yet most companionable disposition, he was always conspicuous by his military regularity in devotion to duty, and participated actively, forcefully, and influentially in the deliberations of this body, affording me many educational opportunities, for which I am now appreciably thankful for his thoughtful consideration.

He was an ardent and enthusiastic advocate of any measure from which he perceived a substantial benefit to the common weal would follow, but a fearless and tireless worker against that which did not meet with his approbation.

He manifested an especial interest in matters relating to educational and civic improvements, and, of the latter, notably the development of the waterways of New York Harbor and its tributaries, which he always sought to impress upon me was the foremost consideration deserving my attention in this Congress.

A veteran of the Civil War, he was intense in his patriotic devotion to his country, and particularly to the memory of those who had given of their services as his comrades, and it is not surprising to find that he was the foremost advocate and predominating factor in inaugurating a plan of military instruction in the public schools and inculcating the patriotic spirit in the youth of New York City. He devoted much of his time and talents arousing public sentiment in favor of this movement, and was one of the organizers of the military battalion of Public School 87 in the Borough of Manhattan, New York City, and which has since been adopted in all of the larger public schools in that city. The youthful inmates to the number of thousands participate every year in the Memorial Day parade, which will soon be bereft of the grizzled and enfeebled veterans of 1861–1865.

It was my privilege to attend with Col. GOULDEN a few days before he died a luncheon in New York City, on which occasion he delivered the last public address he ever made. He emphasized the long and arduous fight which he had carried on to secure by congressional enactment two great improvements of inestimable benefit to the upper section of the city, and one of which was adopted by the Sixty-third Congress, the other being situate in the district now represented by myself, and he said—it seems now almost prophetically—"My chief ambition to secure for the people of my district their most needed improvement is accomplished; my work is done; the other is in the district of my young and vigorous friend, who has the strength—and other adjectives which modesty impels me to omit—to take up the work which I have but begun." Col. GOULDEN had postponed a visit to Taneytown, Md., to join his daughter who had preceded him there, but left immediately after the meeting above referred to, and upon his return to Philadelphia the following Monday afternoon he was stricken in the Pennsylvania Railroad station and died peacefully.

In his pocket was found a poem of which he had intended to make use at a dinner of his Grand Army comrades the following Saturday evening and which I think makes a most fitting summary of his life and character:

A little more tired at close of day,
A little less anxious to have our way;
A little less ready to scold and blame,
A little more care of a brother's name;
And so we are nearing the journey's end,
Where time and eternity meet and blend.

A little more love for the friends of youth,
A little less zeal for established truth;
A little more charity in our views,
A little less thirst for the daily news;
And so we are folding our tents away,
And passing in silence at close of day.

A little less care for bonds and gold,
A little more zest in the days of old;
A broader view and a saner mind,
A little more love for all mankind;
And so we are faring adown the way
That leads to the gates of a better day.

A little more leisure to sit and dream,
A little more real the things unseen;
A little nearer to those ahead,
With visions of those long loved and dead;
And so we are going, where all must go,
To the place the living may never know.

A little more laughter, a few more tears,
And we shall have told our increasing years;
The book is closed and the prayers are said
And we are part of the countless dead.
Thrice happy if then, some soul can say,
"I live because the Grand Army passed my way."

Mr. Speaker, with him I wish to add that I live because Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN passed my way.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I felt a deep sense of personal loss when I learned of the death of our colleague, Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN. His genial optimism was ever a source of inspiration, and his happy smile radiated joy to every heart.

In his long service in the House the record shows he was an able Representative, true to every interest of those who trusted him. That this conscientious adherence to duty was appreciated by those he represented was demonstrated by the fact that after serving them for eight years he announced his intention to retire from Congress, and did retire for two years. His people, however, so strongly desired his return to public life that he was unanimously designated and confirmed at the primaries in 1912 and elected to the Sixty-third Congress. He again accepted their commission, and his later service was marked by that same fidelity to duty which was ever an outstanding quality in his public work. Knowing him as I did, I can thoroughly appreciate this devotion to him on the part of his constituents. He was truly their Representative, and their interests were to him paramount.

I could not forego this opportunity of adding my word of tribute to his noble service and this expression of my personal regard for him as a man, a friend, a patriot. The Nation shares his loss with his family, friends, and constituents.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, our departed friend, JOE GOULDEN, as we called him familiarly on this floor, was a soldier. Since his death I believe there are only two soldiers left in this whole representative body of 435 Members. As Comrade GOULDEN was a heroic unit of that great Army in our greatest war, it seems to me to be appropriate to mention some peculiarities of that war, as distinguished from all other wars in all history.

In the first place it was an open and manly war. It was not a subterranean war. Our trenches were never over waist deep. The army was in full view. Across the waters to-day the armies are all out of sight. They are in trenches from 6 to 8 feet deep, covered by an impervious substance.

There was another peculiarity of our war. During our whole four years' struggle there was not a woman or a child or a noncombatant killed by a soldier. Now there is in progress a war where they drop bombs down from the sky and murder innocent women and children.

There was another peculiarity of our war. Every soldier who stood behind a gun knew just what he was fighting for. In the present war the German peasant on one side of the River Rhine has no quarrel with the French peasant on the other side of the River Rhine. They are of the same class, they have the same general interests, and yet they are at each other's throats. Neither knows what he is fighting for.

There was another peculiarity of our war that never has attached to any other war in all history. It was the only war in all history where the soldiers on the march and around the bivouac fires at night sang patriotic songs and recited poems of their own composition. In the War of the American Revolution the leaders of that struggle were the most highly educated men on either continent. In the North they were graduates of Yale, Harvard, and Princeton, and in the South of the College of William and Mary. Yet in that great struggle that lasted for seven years no epic poem was ever written, and not a soldier of the Continental Army sang a patriotic song. It was the same in the War of 1812 and the same in the Mexican War. But in our war over 100 patriotic songs were sung by the soldiers. The South sang Dixie, the Bonnie Blue Flag, Maryland, my Maryland, and Somebody's Darling. The North sang John Brown's Body, Tenting To-night on the Old Camp Ground, Who Will Care for Mother Now, the Battle Hymn of the Republic, and 50 other songs that I have not the time to recall. That was the peculiarity of our war. And the very first song that was ever sung in the camp of an army on either continent, written by a soldier, was sung by the famous Hutchinson family of New Hampshire in the camps of the Army of the Potomac; a song written by Col. Fletcher Webster, of the Twelfth Massachusetts Regiment, in Boston Harbor in 1861. He was the son of Daniel Webster, of ante bellum fame. He wrote the song, John Brown's Body Lies Mouldering in the Grave; a soldier by the name of John Brown, not the John Brown who went up at the halter's end at Harpers Ferry in December, 1859, but another John Brown, who belonged to the Twelfth Massachusetts Regiment.

Another remarkable thing of that war was that the poetic literature of the war was not written by the great ante bellum poets of that period. With the exception of Whittier not one of them wrote a patriotic song. That is remarkable. Take that pathetic song sung in all camps in the North and South alike because it is so universal in sentiment that it seems like the mother cry of all war-cursed nations, Tenting To-night on the Old Camp Ground.

The most pathetic poem of the war on the Southern side was written by Chaplain Ryan, of Mobile, in a single hour, after the surrender of Lee. I think I have a couplet here. I can remember most of it. This poem was first published anonymously, I think in the New Orleans Delta, but in a collection of southern poems published after the war it is credited to Annie Pyle Dennis, of Louisiana. I did not know the author of the poem until I purchased a copy of Father Ryan's poems in 1888 and found this among them. It seems as if Father Ryan's whole soul had gone out in the poem. Speaking of the Stars and Bars, the battle flag of the Confederacy—

Furl that banner, for it's weary;
Round its staff 'tis drooping, dreary;
Furl it, fold it—it is best,
For there's not a man to wave it
And there's not a sword to save it,
And there's no one left to lave it
In the blood which heroes gave it!
Furl it, hide it—let it rest!

One of the most pathetic poems of the war was written by a soldier, Col. Charles G. Halpine, who commanded the Irish Brigade of the Army of the Potomac, writing under the nom de plume of Miles O'Rielly. He wrote the poem read on the battlefield of Gettysburg at the time the President of the United States, Mr. Lincoln, delivered the oration, but that was not his best poem. His best poem is, "We have drunk from the same canteen." It has more of the soldierly feeling, fellowship, and sympathy than any poem written during the war:

It was sometimes water and sometimes milk,
And sometimes apple-jack fine as silk,
But whatever the tipple had been,
We shared it together in bane and bliss,
And I warm to you, friend, as I think of this,
We have drunk from the same canteen.

Mr. Speaker, I knew Comrade GOULDEN perhaps as well as any Member outside the New York delegation. I sat beside him when we had desks in this House for three Congresses. He was the soul of kindness and affability, with remarkable simplicity of character. His sketch in the Congressional Directory was brief and unpretentious. He did not even mention the fact that he was a soldier of the Civil War. It can be said of him that he had no enemy on either side of the House, always fair in debate, always considerate of the opinions of his colleagues; always attentive to his duties, he has left an enduring record of duty well performed. His life, his character, his career will always be a grateful memory to his family, his kindred, and his congressional colleagues. I was always glad to be his comrade and friend. In his companionship I felt as some gentle-minded lyrist has written: "I would rather have a plain coffin without a flower, a funeral without an eulogy, than a life without sweetness of love and sympathy." Post-mortem kindness does not cheer the troubled spirit. My departed friend and comrade shed the flavor of kindness and cheerfulness on all his friends. He always seemed to remember what all of us should remember, that we travel the road of life but once, and was trying to make the world better for having lived.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, my predecessor in this House, the Hon. Rufus E. Lester, was one of the most kindly men I ever knew. He was a great man in every sense of the word; he was one of the bravest Confederate soldiers who ever drew a sword. A fast friendship sprung up between Mr. Lester and the Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN. On the occasion of memorial addresses on February 10, 1907, on the life and character of the late Hon. Rufus E. Lester, Mr. GOULDEN opened his memorial address with these remarks:

He was loved and respected by the thousands who knew him. Ever genial, kindly hearted, he had a good cheerful word for everyone. To know him was to love him. I could not let this occasion pass without a few brief words of tribute to the memory of our departed friend.

And he adds further:

He loved his fellow men and in return was loved by them.

To-day, Mr. Speaker, I can not let this occasion pass without paying a tribute, in a few words, to the life, character, and usefulness of this departed friend. I come with a sad heart to speak briefly of the late Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN. On account of the friendship that had existed prior to my coming here between Mr. GOULDEN and my predecessor, Mr. GOULDEN was one of the first men I met when I began my services here in the Sixtieth Congress.

I saw in his face, when I met him, an evidence of the fact that he was a man with a golden heart. I felt in his warm handgrasp a welcome here, and I felt almost from the beginning that in him I had a friend. I learned to appreciate Mr. GOULDEN for his faithfulness here in his services to his country, and I also appreciated him as a friend.

He was a member of the Fifty-eighth, Fifty-ninth, Sixtieth, and Sixty-first Congresses. He wished to retire to private life and did retire. He was succeeded in this chamber in the Sixty-second Congress, but, appreciating his sterling worth, the people again asked that he return here and serve them, and, accordingly, in the Sixty-third Congress he was again a member of this body. This is a high evidence within itself of his standing in his community. It is a testimonial of the esteem in which his people held him. His record here among us is an open book. We all testify to his useful and able services in Congress and to the country.

In his memorial address on the occasion to which I have referred he used these words in referring to the late Col. Lester:

He was a typical gentleman of the old school, a splendid type of American citizenship. His voice is forever still, his kind, loving words will be heard no more, but his life's work will live in the history of his country and in the hearts of his friends.

How like Mr. GOULDEN himself, and how applicable to-day are these words to the man who spoke them! In concluding his remarks on that occasion in his eulogy to his friend he said:

As a Union veteran, proud of the heroism and bravery of the men engaged in the conflicts of the Civil War, a common heritage commemorating the deeds of our American citizen soldiery, I place this tribute to the memory of my late comrade, Rufus E. Lester, of Georgia.

These are the words of a Union soldier in his tribute to a departed Confederate officer. Free from bitterness and full of love, which was so characteristic of both these good men.

Mr. GOULDEN was a man with a generous heart. In all my service here with him I never heard him speak ill of anyone. In the long list of Members who sat with him in this House no one can state that he ever knew of the late Mr. GOULDEN saying or doing anything to intentionally wound the feelings of his fellows. Those are the things that make for greatness in men—a large, sympathetic heart, with a brotherly feeling, filled with human kindness. He was a Christian gentleman and had a steadfast belief in the great Maker of all the universe, and on the memorial occasion referred to he used this poem, which I to-day quote as fitting upon this sad occasion:

There is no death; what seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian
Whose portal we call Death.

We all miss Mr. GOULDEN; we miss his smiling face, we miss his kind words, we miss the sunshine of his presence; and we shall continue to miss him. The House has lost one of its most useful Members; his State and Nation in his death have sustained an irreparable loss.

Mr. BENNET assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

[Mr. FITZGERALD addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, we have assembled in this legislative hall of the Nation to pay respect to the memory of our late colleague JOSEPH A. GOULDEN. To me the duty which the hour imposes is a labor of love and I gladly welcome the opportunity to pay my tribute to his noble attributes of mind and heart.

I had the pleasure of serving with our late colleague on one of the important committees of the House. Meeting him frequently, I had the opportunity to observe and grew to admire the sterling qualities of his character. I shall leave to others the pleasure of reciting his long, successful business career and his long, honorable career as a Member of the House. I shall content myself with calling attention to what seemed to me to be the dominant element of his life—the genial, social kindness of his nature.

It is a noble tribute to a man when it can be said that his life is marked by uniform kindness, and that the more you know of him the better you grow to like him, and this all can be said of our worthy friend, whose memory we cherish and whose life of service and brotherly kindness we admire.

I have sometimes thought that the element of kindness was the noblest element of our nature; that the best and sweetest thing in all this world is simple, common, every-day kindness. Kindness is the most beautiful flower that grows and blooms in the soil of the soul. It is the one celestial flower that blossomed over the walls of Paradise and fell from the garden of the skies; its petals caught and carried the fragrance of heaven and it fills the earth with the incense of gladness. It sweeps the existence of time and reaches through boundless space even from the pit of hell to the gates of heaven and sits enthroned the best influence that sweetens life or molds a soul—kindness.

And so I can pay my friend no finer tribute than to say that in his daily life he exemplified the spirit of kindness in his contact with his fellow men. He believed with Washington Irving that—

A kind heart is a fountain of gladness, diffusing everything around it with pleasure and freshens everything into smiles.

and with Tennyson when he says:

How'er it be, it seems to me
'T is only noble to be good.
Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood.

I know he thought with Hans Christian Andersen that—

The best love man can offer
To a God of love, be sure,
Is mercy to God's little ones
And kindness to God's poor.

And so his life can teach us all that which we all should know: that kindness is beautiful—beautiful like the memory of your dear old mother's face; that kindness is the open door to happiness; that kindness is the golden key that unlocks and gives you the passport to all hearts, to friendship with the world's noblest and best; to happiness on earth, success in life, and entrance through the gates of heaven. I am told by those who have known our friend long and well that his kindness found outlet in noble deeds. With Holland he believed—

That a noble deed is a step toward God,
Lifting the soul from the common sod
To a purer air and a broader view.

Life is a mysterious reality.

It has been defined as a span of time between a cry and a sigh.

We begin it with a cry—we end it with a sigh.

Between these boundaries, brief as they are, is worked out the destiny of human life.

Into this short space of time are crowded the joys and sorrows, the hopes and struggles, the successes and failures of human life.

During this brief span are generated and nourished the forces and influences that govern life on earth and mould its destiny throughout the cycles of eternity.

And when sometimes in a serious mood our conscious self knocks at the portal of our very soul and asks, "What is life?" the serious thinking mind recoils, as it were, upon itself and asks, "Is birth the beginning of death, or is death the beginning of life?"

What is life?

It's a delicate shell
Thrown up by eternity's flow
On time's bank of quicksand to dwell
And a moment its loveliness show;
Then gone back to the element grand
Like the billow that cast it ashore.
See! another is washing the strand
And the beautiful shell is no more.
Life is a drop from the river
That rises in mist o'er the lea
A moment in space to quiver
Then falls on the breast of the sea.
It was—it is—now gone forever
Yet lives through eternity.

And so, thus living a life of service and kindness, his buoyant, courteous manner never deserted him; but when the end came—

Like a shadow thrown softly and sweetly
From a passing cloud, death fell upon him—

And when for him the golden bowl was broken and the silver cord was loosed he, too, could approach his grave—

Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

And when his path of life led to the door of the night of death it opened for him into the daybreak of a glorious immortality. And we who knew and loved him trust with that hope born of Christian faith that he found that—

Death is but an angel, who to man at last his freedom brings
And the grave is but a nest in which the soul shall find its wings.

Mr. BRUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives lost a valuable, painstaking Member in the untimely death of my colleague, JOSEPH A. GOULDEN. The pages of the RECORD will show that he was interested in the legislative program of the Nation, as well as that pertaining to his own congressional district, during his many years of service as a Member of Congress.

Life's race well run,
Life's work well done,
Now comes rest.

How could the life and work of our departed colleague be better expressed than in these few simple words? Col. GOULDEN was one of God's noblemen; the 71 years that he lived made the world better, because of the manner in which he lived.

He believed in the doctrine expressed by the poet who said:

How much joy and comfort we all can bestow
If we scatter sunshine wherever we go.

Those of us who knew him intimately only knew too well how he spread the sunshine wherever he would go. His presence always seemed a message of cheer and good will. He had a window in his heart always open for the expression of his candor and sincerity.

His integrity was superb, but his predominant quality was courage—courage to fight wrong and injustice—yea, courage to stand loyally by a friend.

Col. GOULDEN was a brave man; he was brave morally, and that is the highest type of bravery; that courage that reinforces conduct; that courage that supports character; that courage that makes the real man; that moral courage of belief and conviction.

Col. GOULDEN was a lovable man when you approached him, got near to him, when there was a fellowship between you. I never knew a man who was more lovable in his character or more tender in his sympathies. He was a man of great compassion, because he had in him a great heart. His sympathies were as broad as humanity, because his great heart was not prejudiced in ignorance, superstition, or in narrowness of conception. Wherever there was a human being Col. GOULDEN was prepared to say: "He is a part of the brotherhood of man under the fatherhood of God."

I have good reason to speak in praise of this noble man. He and I were not only colleagues in Congress but we were intimate friends. When I came to Washington a green, raw Member, it was to him I looked for information and advice; and I found him always ever ready to help and assist me. I shall miss him in the future.

I learned to respect, admire, and to love this grand old man, who died as he lived—in the harness. His loss is a sad blow to the Borough of the Bronx, where he lived for the past 25 years, and for which he labored here unceasingly and accomplished much good. His loss will not only be felt in The Bronx but the country loses the services of one of its ablest legislators. Not only did he serve his country in the House of Representatives but answered his country's call in the dark days of the Civil War and served with distinction and honor. His death reduces the men who served in that war now Members of this House to a mere remnant of a guard.

The boys of '61 called him Comrade—that gem of human language which sometimes means but a little less than love and a little more than friendship—that gentle salutation of the human heart which lives in all the languages of man, that winds and turns and runs through all the joys and sorrows of the human race, through deed and thought and dream, yea through song and toil and battlefield.

I was aboard the funeral train as it bore his remains from New York City to its last resting place in the quaint village of Taneytown, Md., to sleep beside his father and his grandfather. I never witnessed such a demonstration of genuine affection for any man in public life as I saw evidenced by the people of that little Maryland town. Hundreds flocked to the railroad station to catch a glimpse of the casket containing the body of their dear old friend as it was taken from the train and joined in the escort to the church. After the services, while his body was lying in state in that little church he so often attended, a vast multitude passed the bier in solemn procession looking for the last time on his peaceful face. There were tears and sobs and flowers upon his casket that sad day.

Mr. Speaker, as the years pass by, one by one we drop out, one by one we lay aside our task and cease our labor and toil. Time and again we are called upon to repeat the sad service we are performing to-day—to pay a just tribute of respect and homage to the memory and faithful service of a man who has gone before us. Col. GOULDEN was a man of splendid character, but at last he has laid off his armor, he has ceased to march, he failed to respond to the bugle call to duty in this life. Life's fitful fever is over, he sleeps well, he has passed from among us, and I ask myself the question: Where shall we find him, where is he? I may not be able to mark it on a chart, but I do know that wherever the Great Creator shall gather the great, the good, the pure, the noble, and the brave there we shall see and there we shall find Col. GOULDEN.

He was an affectionate father and good husband, a true friend, and over-generous political enemy. In politics a Democrat. In patriotism a thorough American. His great virtue charity. His constant desire was to serve God and his fellow man. Some men are made to be admired, some to be loved, a few to be loved and admired. To this small and goodly company Col. GOULDEN belonged.

Green be the turf above thee,
Friend of former days;
None knew thee but to love thee,
None named thee but in praise.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to pay tribute to the life, character, and memory of our late colleague, Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN.

My acquaintance with him began early in the Sixtieth Congress. In the office building we occupied adjoining rooms with a connecting door, and this door was never locked.

The acquaintance thus begun ripened into friendship that grew stronger as the years passed.

He was a modest, retiring, kindly man; neither self-asserting nor self-seeking. His was the manner of the well-to-do, well-read, and neighborly farmer. On one occasion, after a visit to his farms, he said to me that he derived more pleasure and enjoyment from a three days' visit to his farms than he did from his months of service in this House.

No man of nobler character or more blameless public or private life ever served a constituency in this Chamber. If a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches then he surely left to his family an inheritance most desirable, and one which will endure as long as time shall last.

No one who knew Mr. GOULDEN as I did could fail to love, admire, and respect him, and I shall cherish through all my future life the memory of his friendship as one of the blessings which a kind Providence has granted me.

As a good and faithful public servant the reward he most desired was the approval of his own conscience and the approbation of the people he loved and served.

The legacy of his life and its ennobling example is the common heritage of the living. His lifelong course of undeviating rectitude secures to his afflicted family an imperishable title to honorable distinction. Well may the widow and children who mourn him find consolation in the words—

God gave. He took. He will restore.
He doeth all things well.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, our lamented colleague, Col. GOULDEN, of New York, was associated with the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Co., of Philadelphia, and frequently came to our city to confer with the officials of that well-known institution. He was therefore popular with us in a business way and his visits were always the occasion of a rallying of his friends both in business and in Grand Army circles. It was in Philadelphia, while waiting for the New York train, he died. The news of his death was flashed over the wires of the country, because the colonel had attained a celebrity amongst Grand Army men, and especially among the advocates of improved waterways along the Atlantic seaboard. The cable carried the sad news to the Hawaiian Islands, where a large party of Senators and Representatives had gone on a tour of inspection. It was from far-off Honolulu that a message of sympathy on behalf of former Speaker CANNON and other congressional associates that a cablegram of condolence was forwarded across the Pacific and over the continent to the bereaved family in the city of New York.

My acquaintance with Col. GOULDEN originated through the movement leading up to the organization of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association. That was back in 1907. The acquaintanceship quickly ripened into a friendship that was only broken by his departure from this earth. The colonel had been interested in the improvement of the harbor of New York. He had given particular attention to the obstructions in the East River, which he had sought to remove, and in the improvement of the Harlem Ship Canal, which connected the East River with the Hudson. This canal, upon which the traffic increased tremendously during Col. GOULDEN's service in Congress, bordered The Bronx district, which he represented, and which, he was proud to contend, had the largest population of any congressional district in the United States.

When the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association was projected the Colonel was quick to see the advantages that would be derived in the cooperation of the representatives of States bent upon a common purpose to open up systematically and economically a continuous line of waterways along the coast. At the first convention in Philadelphia in 1907 he took a leading part. In the subsequent conventions at Baltimore, Norfolk, Providence, Richmond, New London, and Jacksonville he participated, usually as a presiding officer at one of the business sessions. His popularity with the delegates from Maine to Florida was unquestioned. He had friends in every State along the line. In the organization of the New-York-Albany-and-Troy convention of 1914 the Colonel was chairman of the principal arrangements committee. It was New York's opportunity to show its interest and hospitality, and there was no one prouder of his part in bringing it about than our colleague, who, in welcoming the visitors to New York City, was heralded as a leader in the development of that great port. It was on this occasion, too, that he indicated to those who were to take up the work after him that what he had hoped to do within the limit of his powers had been done, and that it was for others now to take up the burden. A prophetic situation in view of what has since occurred!

Mr. Speaker, it was not only as a champion of improved waterways that I knew and admired our departed friend. He was my senior in service in the House of Representatives. The first bill introduced by me which had a chance of passing was a bill to provide a memorial in the city of Washington emblematic of the private soldier. It was supported by the veterans of my city and State and by that noble and fast-disappearing organization, the Grand Army of the Republic, of which Col. GOULDEN was a member. My bill reached the calendar with a favorable report and the Colonel, like other veterans of the Civil War, was interested in it. On the same calendar he had a bill providing for a monument to memorialize the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus. Both bills were in a tight place on the closing days of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and there was great doubt about their passing. I was new in parliamentary matters and was therefore alarmed lest the bill for the soldiers' monument might die with the other measures not reached before the close of the session. The Colonel was more experienced and I appealed to him. We worked together, and through the assistance of strong friends, who came to the rescue, were subsequently able to report to our constituents the passage of our respective bills. The soldiers' monument now stands at the corner of Seventh Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, an enduring tribute to the valor of "the man behind the gun;" the Columbus Monument, an evidence of the friendship and persistency of Col. GOULDEN, occupies a conspicuous place in front of the Union Terminal, where none who come to the Capital City and have eyes to see may fail to observe it.

There were other measures in which the colonel and I cooperated and in which he gave me encouragement, but my experience with him, which I am now pleased to acknowledge, was the experience of only one amongst the many. He was a kindly, genial friend to us all.

He will be remembered especially by newer and younger Members unaccustomed to interruptions in the course of debate for his helpful questions and his desire to relieve embarrassment. Whether for or against a proposition he took his stand with a smile and was always careful to avoid humiliating his antagonist. As I now remember him, seated somewhere in the front of the House, keeping up that splendid record for attendance and attention to duty for which he was conspicuous, I can not recall a single sharp word ever uttered by him during my observation of nearly 10 years. Nor can I think of any worthier tribute to lay upon his grave than to say that which all of us know to be true—he was generous as he was brave; he was charitable as he was firm. In private life he was upright and pure. In public life he was faithful to his every trust.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, in the hurry and bustle of work on the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization I have not had time to prepare as elaborately as I would have desired such remarks as would adequately express my appreciation of the high value of the service that Col. GOULDEN rendered to our country.

When I speak of Col. GOULDEN I do not speak of one who was known to me merely by name. It seems to me but yesterday that in 1893, when I was a pupil in one of the public schools in New York City, that Col. GOULDEN, then one of the school commissioners of the city of New York, walked in one morning to pay a visit and address our class of boys.

He told us of his service in the Civil War and how he had been one of the listeners to our lamented President Lincoln's words at the dedication of the Gettysburg battlefield as a cemetery for those who had indeed given their lives for the country's salvation and that the Union might live. He told us how he had been impressed with the words that had been delivered by Lincoln, and that he, too, failed to realize that in years to come the address then being delivered before him and being heard by him would become as famous as the President who delivered it.

It is not an astonishing fact that as a result of Col. GOULDEN'S talk the boys of that class commenced to and did make a study of the life of Lincoln and the Civil War to an extent that is surprising, looking back, as I do now, over 20 years of time.

Col. GOULDEN gallantly served the Republic in its hour of need, rendered to the city of New York services as a member of the board of education, and in other capacities in a manner that must always be a lasting monument to his fame and in this House made a record for attendance, for devotion to duty, for genuine service to our country, and for instilling true patriotism in the hearts of the growing generation that has not been equaled by many men in the United States.

Speaking as one who watched his career for over 20 years, I can truly say that he was always admired and respected in the little town where he first saw the light of day, revered and honored in the city of New York, where he spent a good part of his life, and I express the firm belief that his name will go down into the history of New York City, in this House, and in the State of Maryland, where we tenderly laid him to rest last May, as one who was a loyal patriot and devoted citizen, who loved his family dearly, who was not only an honor to his country, but a credit to it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I mourn with the family and friends of our deceased brother his untimely death, and I feel the grief that comes when a good friend dies. I knew Congressman GOULDEN well and favorably. I admired him greatly and he was my friend. As a Member of Congress he was the friend of every good cause. He was an industrious, able, and faithful Representative. New York Harbor never had a better friend in this House. He was a brave and gallant Federal soldier. He was a true disciple of Lincoln and was greatly devoted to our martyred President.

He was a polished gentleman—polite and courteous always.

He possessed a cheerful disposition, and sunshine and good cheer belonged to him as flowers and bird song belong to spring. He had a beautiful conception of life. He was a man of lofty principles and high ideals. He has served well his day and generation. Peace to his ashes. God rest his soul.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, one can hardly realize that JOSEPH A. GOULDEN has been called hence. He was here on the 4th day of March last, and separated from his fellows in apparent good health.

Mr. GOULDEN was of a genial disposition and always bore a smile on his face when greeting his friends. He was one of the few who carried sunshine wherever he went. His pleasant manner endeared him to his associates. He was one of those who apparently had a good conscience himself and expected nothing but kindness from others. Such men are few in number. The average busy man, such as he was, is studious and sometimes forgetful of others. But Mr. GOULDEN never seemed to be so engrossed in his work as to be neglectful of the ordinary civilities of life. The value of such conduct can not be correctly measured. The kind word, the smile of greeting, the hearty hand shake, the manifestation of personal concern, has driven the clouds of gloom from many an individual.

This life is full of trials, misfortunes overtake, sorrows are met, and men who are factors in smoothing the pathway of those who are thus afflicted, as Mr. GOULDEN did, are real benefactors.

Many men bear malice, seek revenge, and are spiteful to those who antagonize them, but Mr. GOULDEN was not so. He possessed that splendid coolness, that genuine poise, that superior manner that would tend to win men and overcome their want of generosity.

If I am not mistaken, Mr. GOULDEN was a superior man in personal character, in the recognition of the rights of others, and the exhibition of those lofty virtues which are possessed only by those of genuine integrity. Those finer sentiments in relation to country which would cause him to give life itself, if necessary, were constantly exhibited in the life of Mr. GOULDEN. He was a truly patriotic man. Himself an old soldier, he had the deepest sympathy for those who gave service on the field of battle. He was honored by position in recognition of this devotion to the "boys in blue"; but not alone was he interested in those who fought for the Union, but he had an abiding affection for those who wore the "gray" in the civil strife as well. In one of the last conversations I had with him, in speaking most sympathetically of the southern Confederate, he said:

If I had my way, we would pension every one of them; they were just as honest and true as we were. We were all parties to the settlement of great questions which will never again be raised to disturb or annoy, and the Confederate is now as loyal to the flag as I am.

In his public service he manifested the same fidelity and genuine regard for the rights of others. His ambition was to do the right and to act justly toward all men. He was not an orator, but was frank and plain in speech. He was not a great statesman, but had that sense of justice and fairness which is convincing in its simplicity. He was in no sense conspicuous, for he was a modest and retiring man, but his merit was the more appreciated the longer one knew him. He was one of those genial, faithful, true gentlemen whose worth is never fully known, nor his real value properly estimated, but whose service is crowned with good intentions and faithful effort and whose merit is the more recognized as the real man is studied in the light of his achievements.

Life is a mystery at best. Whence we came and whither we may go is as much a puzzle as the Bible story of man's duty and destiny. Why should some die and others live is a marvel which men can not explain. Why Mr. GOULDEN, in the enjoyment of health and with a natural expectancy in life for a number of years, should so soon pass to the beyond, I can not explain. This we know—his race is run, his duties are over, and he lies cold in the embrace of death. Unless the seed dies, it can not live again in the vegetable world; unless this mortal body shall put off human environment, it can not enjoy immortality—is a story which nearly all accept.

Mr. GOULDEN has tested that vital truth. His life work is a splendid heritage to those he leaves behind, his example is helpful to those who consider it, and his memory is a sweet remembrance to those who knew him best. Time dealt gently with him after all; he lived beyond the three score years and ten, which is man's allotted time. I sometimes feel that one is fortunate to be called hence while yet active, before the sun of usefulness is fully set and the burden of dependence on others is reached.

The country has lost a faithful public servant. This House has lost an honored Member, and his colleagues a personal friend. So far as we can tell it may be said: He fought a good fight in life. He kept the faith in loyalty to the country and to his fellows, and he no doubt enjoys that reward which comes from devotion to duty and the sacrifices made in a well-spent life.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, it is an inestimable privilege, it seems to me, to have been associated with a few men who took part on either side of the great struggle from 1861 to 1865, and it is an irreparable loss to the membership of the House when one of the few remaining men who knew and went through that great experience has passed away.

I came into this House with the Sixty-third Congress; and the upheaval that preceded the election of that Congress took out of the House most of the Civil War veterans who were Members of the Sixty-second Congress. I believe Gen. SHERWOOD and Mr. GOULDEN and Mr. Kirkpatrick were the only Union veterans left in the House of Representatives, all three of them on the Democratic side. Certainly more kindly and friendly spirits never lived. There was nothing in the life of Mr. GOULDEN, who has passed away from us, or in the life of Gen. SHERWOOD, who we hope will remain with us for many years, that suggests that military training or participation in a great war leads to what is called militarism. Mr. Kirkpatrick was not a candidate for reelection, but this Congress has brought back Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH, of Ohio, to keep Gen. SHERWOOD company.

Mr. Speaker, there is little more that I can say about Mr. GOULDEN that has not been said by Members with a friendship of a longer standing. I may perhaps say that I, in a sense, inherited my friendship for Mr. GOULDEN. One of my predecessors in this House was Col. Thomas W. Bradley, a veteran of the Civil War. He was a warm friend of Col. GOULDEN, and when I first came into this House one of the first men that I got acquainted with on the Democratic side was Col. GOULDEN, who knew the district that I came from and took pains to look me up, and gave me advice which was always good advice. I have profited greatly by his friendship, and I have greatly missed him.

One thing in Col. GOULDEN's recent service in this House stands out in my memory as worthy of special mention at this time, and that is his eloquent tribute to Abraham Lincoln, delivered on February 12, 1914.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I am speaking the sentiment of my adopted State, of my colleagues of the Pennsylvania delegation, when I pay a respectful and affectionate tribute to the memory of one of the gifted men of the Keystone State. Mr. GOULDEN was a Pennsylvanian. While he was transplanted, or transplanted himself, to another Commonwealth many years before his death, he remained during all the years of absence from Pennsylvania still at heart and soul a son of that great State. Our acquaintance began with my entrance into Congress three years ago. He was one of the very first of the older Members to seek me out, to give me a welcome, to extend a cordial sympathy, and to be of real help in guiding my unaccustomed feet in this great assembly. Afterwards it became my privilege to be associated with him on one of the great committees in this House—a committee which is dealing with a very large and a very vital problem, affecting the very life of our free institutions—and I am very glad to say to-day, in memory of that man, that he was always true to the high ideals of this Republic, to the ideals which are embodied in the Declaration of Independence, which says that all men are created equal and that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. I am very glad to bear testimony to the fact that our departed friend was not one who believed that it was well for this Republic to follow in the footsteps of empire. He believed that sooner or later, the sooner the better, we should be rid of dependencies, and he was working faithfully, with courage—I believe with vision—toward an end which I hope may soon be achieved.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, we are gathered here to-day to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, better known to us as Col. GOULDEN, a colleague who was one of the most beloved men of Congress and one of the best known.

JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, representing the twenty-third congressional district of New York, was suddenly called to his last home on the 3d day of May, 1915, in the city of Philadelphia, in his seventy-first year of age, after a useful religious public and private life. Those who had seen him only a few days before, and others who saw him on the very day of his passing away, pronounced him in splendid physical and mental condition. His mind and activities were as fresh and vigorous as they had ever been in his lifetime. He still looked to the future expecting to perform even greater work than ever before and looked forward with every degree of hope and aspiration to another busy session of Congress and to more benefits to be derived for those constituents of his district whom he loved so dearly and for the great body of American citizens to whom he was so deeply attached.

There was perhaps no man in Congress more revered by the people of his home city, his colleagues in Congress, and his friends of every religious creed and political shade, than was Congressman GOULDEN. Not only was he an active business man, but he found abundant time to devote to the exacting duties as a representative of a large busy congressional district. He likewise was interested in farming and there was no time when he took more pleasure out of life than when he was engaged in the pursuits of agriculture on his farms in Carroll County, Md., my native State.

He was particularly beloved by the people of Maryland, especially those who knew him as "Farmer GOULDEN" in Carroll County. At the great annual picnic or farmers' meeting of which he was the forefront at Taneytown, Md., Representative GOULDEN was indeed in his element of pleasure and happiness. In that section he stored up in the minds of the farmers and villagers all he had to say and do, which has had its great influence upon the farming and business interests of that section.

Through this interest in his farms of our State he became a part of that section; he was an interested supporter of everything that was beneficial to the interests of Maryland and to the great metropolis of Baltimore. Often have I spoken of him and said: "Maryland has in Congress seven Representatives; six elected from the districts of Maryland and the seventh elected from the twenty-third district of New York." He had not only the time and the ability to represent the teeming population of his own district, but he took time and sufficient interest to look into those matters appertaining to the welfare of Maryland.

His genial countenance, splendid fellowship, and good will impressed all who came in contact with him. It was a bright spot in the convening of the House of Representatives each morning to meet Representative GOULDEN, for he was strict in attendance, and to receive his handclasp, kindly smile, and best wishes for a successful day.

I became one of his close personal friends, as also did my colleagues from Maryland. I was in constant touch with him in the work of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association, and there was no man, to my knowledge, who exerted a greater influence in those matters in which he was interested than did this genial Representative from New York.

I could not, Mr. Speaker, allow to pass this opportunity to publicly express to the family, friends, and constituents of Representative GOULDEN how much the people of my State appreciated his friendship and assistance; how much my colleagues and I appreciated the splendid support of our late friend and associate and his good will and friendly intercourse at all times.

Maryland may have many residents who are not natives of her soil, she may have many friends to locate within her borders, but none can ever take the place of Representative GOULDEN in the hearts and minds of his Maryland friends.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. Speaker, I did not know the late Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, but I counted upon the prospective privilege of knowing him through a letter of introduction which I carried in my pocket until the morning in May when I read that his life had suddenly gone out. In one sense, Col. GOULDEN was identified with the congressional district I have the honor to represent, and that was through his long connection with the New York State Soldiers and Sailors' Home, at Bath, N. Y. In 1902 he was appointed by the governor of New York as a trustee of that home. He held that post until his death, and for the last year of his life was president of the board of trustees.

In response to an inquiry, Col. Joseph E. Ewell, commandant of the home, writes to me feelingly as follows:

> Col. GOULDEN was active, energetic, able, and efficient in the discharge of his duties, and was greatly interested in the home. He rarely missed a meeting of the board of trustees, often being obliged to come from Washington for that purpose; and in a marked degree he gained the confidence, respect, and good-will of all connected with the home as members or officers. He was kindly, genial, and friendly in his attitude toward every one with whom he had personal or business relations.

In the resolutions upon the death of Col. GOULDEN adopted by the board of trustees of the New York State Soldiers and Sailors' Home appropriate reference is made to the valuable service he rendered in many fields of activity. These resolutions declare that he was—> the type of man the world loves. Just and generous, courageous and conservative, upright and fair, tender and sympathetic of heart, with a message of good will to all and encouragement to his fellow-men, he possessed a character worthy of all emulation, and left memories to be cherished throughout the years to come.

Such was our late colleague, one of the most popular and esteemed Members of this House, a man of strong convictions and yet tolerant in his opinions, charitable in his judgments, and kind and gentle in his acts; a man of incessant activity, who served his State and Nation with loyalty and integrity; who shirked no responsibility, who was equal to every opportunity, and who found his greatest joy and satisfaction in doing his simple duty as a man and citizen and public servant.

We of this House do well to honor his memory to-day, and we bid him farewell with affectionate regret.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, in the presence of death I always feel overwhelmed. Both life and death are mysteries. The mind of the primitive savage and the intellect of the philosopher of modern days are alike helpless when confronted with the problem of existence. We do not know, we do not understand. We can not grapple with the mystery of life, with the problems of life. There is only one thought in my mind when I see a life ebbing away, when I see an active man departing, and that is that every moment of our life should be devoted to some useful service. Let others wreck their minds in the vain effort to solve the mystery of existence, to penetrate the inscrutable veil which separates life from death. For us there can be but only one broad highway in life, and that is the highway of useful, social service. Blessed is the man whose friends can say that he lived a useful, noble life.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, as I was passing through the Capitol I chanced to notice the House was in session, and so happened in this Chamber. My especial attention had not been called to this service, and, like many other Members, was busy with my own affairs, and failed to take note that this day was set apart to pay tribute to the life and character of a departed Member. I am not prepared to speak as I would like, but can not permit this opportunity to pass without saying a word of tribute to my friend, Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN. He was one of the first Members I learned to know well when I came here in the Sixtieth Congress, and as the years rolled by our acquaintance ripened into a warm friendship. He was a most lovable man, as gentle and kind as a woman. He had a big, warm, sympathetic heart. Well do I recall his kindly face. I scarce remember of his ever passing by that he did not say "How are you to-day, Brother?"; and this affectionate greeting was accompanied by an outstretched hand for hearty handclasp. Little wonder that he was admired and loved here as but few men are. A few years ago I was one of a congressional party to make a trip to the Canal Zone. The party was in charge of Col. GOULDEN, who looked after the minutest detail and seemed to think only of our comfort and welfare. He seemed to be always striving to do some kind act for some one. His life was one of service and full of good deeds. I could mention many instances of his great kindness to me personally, and so when I read of the sudden summons which overtook this soldier, statesman, and friend, I felt a deep personal loss. I shall long love to recall many pleasant memories of this good man, and—

I can not say—I will not say—
That he is dead. He is only away.
With a cheery smile and a wave of the hand
He has wandered into an unknown land
And left us dreaming. How very fair
It needs must be, since he lingers there.
And you—oh, you who wildest yearn
For the old-time step and glad return—
Think of him faring on, as dear
In the love There as the love Here.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. Speaker, the ceremonies here to-day indeed impress me with the realization that this House, the Nation, and the State of New York lost a valuable, well-known Member in the death of JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, and I would not be equal to representing my people if I did not, even with my limitations, say a few words at this time.

I have known Col. GOULDEN for many years, and learned to admire him for his careful, painstaking, honest interest in all things pertaining to the welfare of the city and State of New York, as well as the Nation. He seemed to me to be a man of wonderful capabilities in grasping needful situations, and was always willing and anxious to perform his share of the task in finally accomplishing the end. His untimely death on May 3d, at Philadelphia, was flashed to New York City, shocking all of us who knew him, and almost immediately orders came from you to attend his funeral.

The services at the parish church, even at the very early hour at which they were held, were attended by a throng of people. The special train bearing his remains to their last resting place at Taneytown, Md., left an escort of many friends at the station in New York City. The few stops en route for relatives to join the funeral were conspicuous for their gathering at the station of people who knew and loved him. The arrival at his native town, Taneytown, was a picture I shall never forget, as I witnessed the hushed, bareheaded multitude from the town and countryside waiting to pay a tribute of respect to their distinguished departed townsman. The services at the little church and the interment 'neath a tree—a spot he had selected in the churchyard—ended the sad duty that mortal can render the dead, were all attended by this sad concourse of people.

To-day we are gathered in special session to pay a final tribute in an official manner to him who was one of us and is no more.

Men are known by their words and their works. The record of JOSEPH A. GOULDEN stands for itself so clear that we might well emulate it.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, when I entered this Chamber for the first time as a Member of this body, April 7, 1913, one of the first of the older Members who took me by the hand and bade me welcome was the late Col. GOULDEN, to commemorate whose noble life and accomplishments we are gathered to-day, and I gladly avail myself of the privilege of paying a tribute to my departed friend.

It was my good fortune to serve with him early in the session, by your appointment, as a member of a committee to visit a distant southern city, during which time we were thrown constantly together, which resulted in the creation of a bond of friendship which was broken by his death. I had the deepest attachment for him, and the news of his death, which reached me on the other side of the continent, came as a distinct shock. His daily kindly greetings as the session advanced were most welcome and his advice and suggestions were of the greatest aid to me in acquainting myself with the business of the House.

I delighted in talking with him about his experiences during the war, probably because of the fact that my father and brother had also served in that great struggle, and I had always been taught to venerate and esteem those who had offered their lives on their country's altar.

He was, indeed, a most interesting personage, genial, courtly, and a man of the most tender sensibilities and noble impulses. He had a host of friends, regardless of politics, drawn to him by his modest, attractive, and kindly personality, who mourn his loss with deep personal grief.

I do not believe any man who has served as a Member of this House was more conscientious or had a higher sense of honor or was more anxious to deal honestly with his fellows than our departed friend. His constituents recognized his high character and ability, and their appreciation of his splendid service in their behalf was shown by repeatedly reelecting him as their Representative in Congress.

It is proper that we should pause from the exacting cares and responsibilities which our duties here impose upon us to pay this tribute of respect to our late colleague, whose life has been a noble and worthy success, devoted to his God, his country, and his friends.

The dread summons which came to him, and which we know not how soon must come to us, found him calmly and resolutely awaiting its approach, as is evidenced in the closing words of a eulogy which he delivered in this House on the life and character of one of his colleagues on an occasion similar to this, and which is also a splendid index to his character, when he said:

His passing was a deep personal loss to me, and my heart was saddened as I saw him laid away in beautiful Laurel Hill Cemetery, with the ever-placid Schuylkill flowing near by. I thought of many things; of the passing friendships that come with years, of my own few remaining days in this House, and of the living friends that may soon sever; then life itself, which has deserted my own good friend thus laid away with so many present to bid him farewell, occupied my thoughts, and looking to myself I whispered in the words of Mrs. Barbauld:

"Life; we have been long together
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather:
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear,
Perhaps will cost a sigh or tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not 'good night,' but in some brighter clime
Bid me 'good morning.'"

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, this is a good world. The pessimistic poet of the past who said:

The evil that men do lives after them, but the good is oft interred with their bones—spoke from an evident experience of the gloomier things of life. It is a good world, because good men and good women make it so. And among those of my acquaintance who have done their share there has been none who ever touched life for its betterment from more angles than Col. GOULDEN. I stand here to-day as his elected successor, through two accidents; latterly the accident of his death; before that, the accidental circumstance of a redistricting of the congressional districts of our State. For six years he and I sat here as colleagues, and the closest of colleagues, for the old seventeenth district and the old eighteenth district marched with each other, to use the old language of the common law, along their boundaries for miles. They were populous districts, and between us we had the responsibility of representing here over a million of the inhabitants of the State of New York. That circumstance and the contiguity of our districts threw us into almost daily contact, and the fact that the House at that time was of my party, and he ever earnestly striving to secure every possible bit of legislation for the benefit not only of those whom he represented but those with whom he was affiliated, made our intercourse of the closest character.

There was a great disparity in our ages. He was precisely the age of my own father, and yet of the two, if there was any difference in energy, the greater activity was his. Our colleague, Mr. FITZGERALD, says that he doubts whether the district realizes the services that it had from Col. GOULDEN. He would not express or have that doubt if he lived in the district. Col. GOULDEN was a Democrat, always, when a candidate of that party, but from the time I first knew him until the time when he died there never was a time in my judgment when as the candidate of another party, or of no party, that great independent community would not have returned him to this House by an emphatic majority.

In the recent campaign, as I walked the streets of that district, young men came to me and said, "We are Republicans, but of course we voted for Col. GOULDEN, because when we were at school it was Col. GOULDEN who used to come around and take an interest in the school, and when the Spanish-American War was on it was Col. GOULDEN that came to our school and organized us into companies to go. Oh yes, we are Republicans, but we always voted for Mr. GOULDEN."

And the business men would say to me, "Well, we wish you luck. Oh yes, we are Republicans, of course we are, but we always voted for Mr. GOULDEN because he was such a good Representative." And the women would say, "Well, Mr. BENNET, so and so, and this and that, but you never would have stood a chance if Col. GOULDEN was living." I will never forget that one of my best supporters in the Bronx, as I sat talking with him, opened the drawer of his desk, took out a photograph of Mr. GOULDEN, held it up, and said "I always voted for him."

Mr. GOULDEN had grown up with The Bronx, he had seen it rise in population from 70,000 to 600,000, and during that entire rise and progress there had been not one single good movement with which he had not been connected, not one. Neither race nor religion constituted a boundary or an impediment for his efforts or his interest.

He was staunch in everything. No one ever had to inquire long to find out that he was a loyal member of the Roman Catholic Church, and yet the best among the Protestants and the Hebrews in The Bronx voted for Mr. GOULDEN. Not only was he loyal to The Bronx, but he was loyal to the city and to the State. We shared between us the temporary guardianship of a waterway which separated our two districts. He knew that waterway, and during his entire service in this House there never was a moment when anything that ought to be obtained for that waterway was not obtained. He knew where to go and when to go and how to do it and what was wanting.

And so in every activity he was helpful and energetic. Two of our colleagues have spoken of the office he held in connection with the Soldiers' Home at Bath. It was near to his heart, and so was every question relating to the old soldier. When I came to look over the bills in his file introduced in the Sixty-third Congress I found that the pension bills introduced in behalf of old soldiers and their widows and veterans of the Spanish-American War were not at all confined to the twenty-third congressional district, but that they covered the State, showing in some degree the acquaintance which he had.

Nearly a score have spoken to-day. I should have been willing that we all should have rested our mutual praise and common appreciation upon the prayer of the Chaplain.

Possibly I am the only one here who recalls that when some years ago the Chaplain reached the 25th anniversary of his marriage, it was JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, a Catholic, who went from man to man and got from each of us $1, and then in the parlor yonder, to the utter surprise of Dr. Couden, presented him with more than three hundred shining silver dollars that he had taken the trouble to procure from the Treasury. It was that sort of act that has brought upon this floor to-day Representatives from more States than I have ever heard in my six years of prior experience deliver addresses at a memorial service. It was that kind of life, touching every interest, that made him dear to this House.

Col. GOULDEN was an active legislator. When the Maine was blown up in Habana Harbor, it was he who introduced the first bill to have the bodies of the dead sailors brought back here. When the great order of which he was a member desired a commemoration of Christopher Columbus in this Capital, it was Col. GOULDEN who worked until the bill for the statue of Christopher Columbus went through. Out of his own mind he evolved the idea that it was a desecration to associate with the flag of our country the advertisement of any business, and it was he who secured the passage of the bill in our State making that particular act a crime. The only unfinished business that I know of in his legislative career is the fact that the bill introduced by him Congress after Congress to place a similar law on the statute books of the United States has not yet passed.

There is no relation of either his public or private life which could not be happily touched upon, no strain of fidelity under which his character gave. Gentlemen have risen to-day and read from memorial addresses delivered by Col. GOULDEN on occasions such as this. Those references could have been indefinitely multiplied. In my six years of service I do not now recall ever having read the proceedings of a memorial service, or having been present at one, with which Col. GOULDEN was not connected, and why? Because he knew good of all of us.

He was to our virtues over kind,
And to our faults a little blind.

He liked men, he was genial, companionable, friendly. It was no veneer; it was the real thing.

I can not speak intimately of his domestic life, for with that I was not closely connected. I know it was all that such a life should have been. I know the happiness of the home, and, in fact, as I glance back through memory along the career of Col. GOULDEN, there seems nothing essential in which he was deficient. Last night, in New York City, in a room, a reproduction of home life of a country in Europe, I saw a little picture that I shall always imagine is typical of the home of Col. GOULDEN. It was a representation of a painting over a fireplace epitomizing the home, simply two hearts intertwined with flowers, and I imagine that the foundation of his home was that.

Mr. Speaker, we change rapidly here. Of the 37 men from New York State who took the oath of office 10 years ago, at the beginning of the Fifty-ninth Congress, but 2, Mr. FITZGERALD and myself, took the oath of office at the commencement of the Sixty-fourth Congress. We go back into private life or into other public activities or into the realms beyond, and we shall be fortunate, each or all of us, if when we say our final farewell it can as certainly be said of us, as it can be said of Col. GOULDEN, that the world is better for our having been here.

I append as a portion of my remarks some of the resolutions introduced on Col. GOULDEN's death.

The resolutions are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION,
Borough of the Bronx, May 21, 1915.

Mrs. JOS. A. GOULDEN,
2433 Creston Avenue.

DEAR MADAM: At a meeting of the local school board of district 25, held on the evening of May 18, 1915, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted and I was directed to transmit the same to you.

"Whereas the Nation, the State, and the city of New York have sustained an irreparable loss in the death of Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, former member of local school board 25, former member of the board of education, and Member of Congress; and

"Whereas the services of Col. GOULDEN in all the offices he has held have been painstaking, conscientious, and signally successful and valuable; and

"Whereas his charming and impressive personality was deeply impressed upon all who came in contact with him;

"Therefore, we hereby express our sense of personal loss and sorrow in view of the demise of this splendid man and exemplary citizen, and implore Almighty God to mitigate by His precious consolations the sorrows of the bereaved members of the surviving family.

"Ordered, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to Col. GOULDEN's family and incorporated in the minutes of this board."

Very sincerely, yours,

HENRY L. SAMSON, Secretary.

GEN. LOUD'S TRIBUTE TO CONGRESSMAN GOULDEN AT THE TESTIMONIAL RECEPTION AND DINNER TO GEN. GEORGE B. LOUD, MAY 8, 1915.

In the midst of our fraternal love feast there is an aching void in the hearts of many present; a note of sadness vibrating on many a heartstring, because of the absence of one loved by us all, and who, so prominent in the initial work for this gathering, would have added so much joy and cheer to it, had God spared him. I refer to our comrade, JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, our last Civil War veteran in Congress from the Empire State.

Without a word of reference to him here would be a woeful omission. He crossed over to the great right wing of our Army and Navy in the other encampment this very week, leaving so many of us sorrowing and yet bewildered, and for our only consolation the memory of his grand work for his State and city, for American citizenship, and the tender and precious memory of his generous and lofty character.

A faithful service in the United States Navy in the Civil War, commended for the faithful and meritorious discharge of duty, a long and active membership in the Grand Army, a citizenship which was an honor to his country and people; so it may be truthfully said of him that the world became richer and fraternity of sublimer significance because of his life, and the world was manifestly poorer on his going out. Few of this great metropolis will be more deeply deplored among the hosts gone before in many years than JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, and after the tears are dried there will come a memory of him to his loved ones and friends that will paint the past with colors which will keep his picture in their hearts and minds always perfect.

As I remember him, who was so close to my life, in his nature there was a wealth of sunshine. Humor flowed from his heart like a sparkling spring gushing out of the rock. His presence always seemed a message of cheer and good will. His inborn geniality amounted to genius which created sweet and wholesome character and radiated cheer. He had a window in his heart, always open for the expression of his candor and sincerity, true to the core. His integrity was superb, but his predominant quality was courage—courage to fight wrong and injustice; courage to stand loyally by a friend and comrade. Those who had business, social, or fraternal relations with JOSEPH A. GOULDEN always relied on the lasting, true devotion of his manhood and were refreshed by the charm of his individuality. In the calm, serene retreat of his home he was like the tree that grows in the sunny South—its leaves ever green, its blossoms pure and sweet; and home to him was the grandest, sweetest spot on earth.

Who will fill his place in the Congress of the United States, representing as he has so faithfully his great constituency, and, too, as the tried and true representative of his comrades, with whom he kept ever in close touch of his heart, and as unshakable in his devotion as the rock of Gibraltar?

THE PIONEER REPUBLICAN CLUB,
Bronx, New York, May 17, 1915.

MRS. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN,
2433 Creston Avenue,
Bronx, New York City, N. Y.

DEAR MADAM: It is with deep feeling that the officers and members of the Pioneer Republican Club of the thirty-fourth assembly district extend to you and yours their sincere expressions of sympathy and condolence on the death of your dear husband, the Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN.

You have suffered an irreparable loss, his friends a cherished companion, and the community which he represented a man in whom reposed their everlasting respect and absolute confidence.

It is our desire, dear madam, that this letter, conveying the heartfelt sympathy of each and every member of this organization, will, in its own way, tend to alleviate your sorrow in this sad hour of bereavement.

Very sincerely, yours,

HARRY ISAACS,
Secretary.

Just a week ago the writer of these lines congratulated Col. J. A. GOULDEN upon his vigorous appearance and the complete possession of all his physical and intellectual qualities that had, at age 71, set him apart from men in general as one exceptionally robust, of splendid health, and destined for continued usefulness for many years. A few hours ago the summons came without a moment's warning; quickly, painlessly, without fear, with sublime confidence in Him "who doeth all things well," an earthly career was ended that had made an impress for good in a wide circle of associates whom he honored with his friendship.

Mr. GOULDEN first came to the company in October, 1879, in the capacity of superintendent of eastern agencies, establishing many new ones and actively and efficiently cooperating with all within his field. In this selection he displayed excellent judgment, bringing to the company many who are still associated with it, and creating among them proper business ideals from which they do not depart. He was one of the organizers in 1883 of The Penn Mutual Agency Association, and was continuously connected with it as an officer, being its president at the time of his death. In April, 1889, he became a general agent in New York City, and in association with his son, Maurice E. Goulden, has represented the company with great reliability and distinguished credit. His energy was so boundless that he participated in the work of many helpful undertakings, being actively interested in school, religious, political, and military circles, in each of which he bore his part manfully, with excellent discretion and wise foresight. Prior to his connection with The Penn Mutual he had served in the Navy during the Civil War, and had been manager of the Pennsylvania State Reformatory. Upon his removal to New York he became a member of the board of education, where his work in behalf of teachers was recognized and applauded. He was a trustee for many years of the Soldiers and Sailors' Home, and recently was president, and had been officially and creditably connected with many organizations because of his keen interest in G. A. R. affairs. He was serving his twelfth year in Congress as a Representative from The Bronx, N. Y., when suddenly called hence. His work in Congress was particularly notable in connection with life insurance affairs; but he also earned the good will of his constituents by close attention to their local matters, as shown by repeated elections with large majorities. In 1913, when the income tax was proposed and debated, he strongly opposed that section which put a tax upon "dividends of surplus," and was markedly influential in securing its elimination. While many men exerted themselves to this end, no one was more powerful than he; and life insurance owes him a debt of gratitude for vigorous and unselfish service, which was politically at his personal risk, his course being the expression of a guiding principle that he would not ignore.

Personally he was most attractive. His was a broad, generous, sympathetic nature that looked upon the world with loving eyes that were animated by a desire to serve and amend. Intellectually he was strong and of determined purpose in advocating what he esteemed to be wholly right, and yet with that old-time grace and courtesy that wounded no sensibility and gathered friends rather than critics and opponents. As husband, father, friend, in all social and business relations, he measured to the full standard of a man. Kind, patient, gentle, and forgiving, courageous in adversity, simple and unpretentious in prosperity, a thoroughly faithful and honorable man in all his dealings, we of his chosen company deplore his loss as an irreparable personal affliction.

HENRY C. LIPPINCOTT.

At a regular meeting of the Holy Name Society of the Church of Our Lady of Mercy, Fordham, N. Y., held on May 9, 1915, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the Holy Name Society of the Church of Our Lady of Mercy, Fordham, N. Y., deplores the loss sustained in the death of our late brother, the Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN. We extend to his family our heartfelt sorrow at their grief, and assure them of our sympathy. In him the Holy Name Society has lost an energetic member, the church a model Catholic, the people of our borough an untiring servant, and the country a most patriotic and devoted citizen. But while our hearts are wrung with the sense of our loss, we glory in the confident hope that his life, spent for the glory of his God, his church, and his country, has earned for him, at the hands of his Maker, a richly earned reward; be it further

"Resolved, That the society offer up its monthly holy communion on the second Sunday of June, 1915, for the repose of his soul; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed, be presented to his family."

At a regular meeting of the Taxpayers' Alliance of the Borough of The Bronx, city of New York, held on the 12th day of May, 1915, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas it has pleased an all-wise God to remove from our midst by death the Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN on May 3, 1915; and

"Whereas the Borough of The Bronx and the country at large have lost in him one of the most distinguished Representatives in Congress, an untiring and honorable business man, an intellectual and brilliant orator, an honored soldier, and a warm and loyal friend and comrade: Be it therefore

"Resolved, That the Taxpayers' Alliance in meeting assembled herewith tender to his bereaved widow and children their sincere sorrow and regret at his sudden and unexpected demise; and be it further

"Resolved, That these resolutions be engrossed and delivered to them as a token of our deep-felt sympathy."

Resolutions adopted by Guiding Star Council, No. 212, Knights of Columbus, upon the death of Hon. Sir Knight JOSEPH A. GOULDEN on May 3, 1915.

Whereas it has pleased God to remove from this world Brother JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, a charter member of this council, who from its very beginning, notwithstanding his other many and varied activities, took an earnest and unceasing interest in its welfare and, by his loyalty and encouragement, materially advanced its usefulness and prosperity; and

Whereas Congressman GOULDEN has rendered his country and his community long and distinguished patriotic and public service, and has also wrought great and lasting benefit to our honored order in ably advocating its principles and objects, and particularly in his successful work for the erection of the great memorial in the National Capital to our patron, the discoverer of America; and

Whereas our departed friend has commanded our emulation and respect by his exemplary practical Catholicity at all times and places, and won our admiration and love by his kindly advice and genial disposition: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we do hereby express our heartfelt grief at the sudden passing of our renowned and well-beloved member and of the loss suffered thereby by our country, our order, and our council; and be it further

Resolved, That we honor and cherish the memory of JOSEPH A. GOULDEN in our hearts and our prayers as of one especially deserving of our gratitude; and be it further

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the record of this council and that an engrossed copy thereof be presented to the bereaved widow and family of our lamented brother as an evidence of our sympathy for them and as a reminder of our attachment to him in life and our memory of him in death.

Minutes adopted by the board of trustees of the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Co., Philadelphia, on the death of Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN.

It having pleased Almighty God to remove from this world our late member, Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, the board of trustees of the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Co., of Philadelphia, desires to record on its minutes an expression of its high appreciation of the many lovable and admirable qualities of the deceased.

While a member of this board but for a brief period, his connection with the company as its supervisor of eastern agencies and later as general agent during a period of more than 40 years brought him into close relation with and endeared him to the entire management of the Penn Mutual.

The confidence and respect in which he was held by all who knew him was evidenced by the many positions of public honors he was called upon to fill, in all of which he performed his duties with great credit and dignity. To be of service to others, he regarded as a pleasure rather than an obligation, and he was untiring in doing, without thought or hope of reward, kindnesses without number.

This board mourns his untimely demise, recognizing not only the loss which the company sustains through his death, but that of the public as well.

The members of the board of trustees desire to extend their sincere and heartfelt sympathies to the family of its departed member.

GEORGE K. JOHNSON,
President.
JOHN HUMPHREYS,
Secretary and Treasurer.

Resolutions adopted by County Committee of the Thirty-fifth Assembly District.

Whereas the Almighty God in His wisdom has called to Himself our late beloved Congressman and fellow committeeman, Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN; and

Whereas Congressman GOUDLEN, by a life devoted to the service of his country, his State, city, and borough, had gained for himself a noble reputation by his genial ways, his zeal, and his ability, endeared himself to all who knew him, and more especially to his friends, comrades, and acquaintances, and by his effort to build up and carry to success the great Democratic Party had won the admiration and esteem of the leaders of our party and the love and affection of the County Committee of the Thirty-fifth Assembly District: Now be it

Resolved, That while submitting to the will of the Almighty, we recognize in the death of Congressman JOSEPH A. GOULDEN the loss to the National Legislature of a wise and zealous Member; to the veterans of the late Civil War of a noble comrade and devoted friend; to the people of this city and borough of a public-spirited citizen; to the Democratic Party of an earnest advocate of the principles of Thomas Jefferson; to the members of the County Committee of the Thirty-fifth Assembly District of an active and sincere fellow worker; and to the members of his bereaved family of a devoted husband and father; and be it further

Resolved, by the members of the County Committee of the Thirty-fifth Assembly District in meeting assembled at the North End Democratic Club, on the 28th day of May, 1915, That we sincerely deplore our great loss and tender to his widow and children our deep sympathy in this their hour of bereavement; and be it further

Resolved, That these preambles and resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this meeting and that a copy of them be engrossed, suitably framed, and presented to Mrs. Isabelle A. Goulden, as a tribute to the memory of her beloved husband, Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN.

JOHN MONAGHAN,
Chairman Democratic County Committee of the Thirty-fifth Assembly District.

NEW YORK STATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME,
BATH, STEUBEN COUNTY, N. Y.

IN MEMORIAM.

Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, president of the board of trustees of the New York State Soldiers and Sailors' Home, and the cherished friend of the members thereof, died in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., on the 3d day of May, 1915, at the age of 71 years.

In the full vigor of his strength, with mental powers unimpaired, with his work unfinished, without even the warning cry of pain or of weariness of mind, full of honors, beloved best by those who knew him best, his life went out and his earthly career was ended. He died as he lived, bravely facing life's duties, successfully bearing life's burdens, and "working out the things given him to do."

JOSEPH A. GOULDEN was in every essential the type of a man the world loves. Just and generous, courageous and conservative, upright and fair, tender and sympathetic of heart, with a message of good will to all, and of encouragement to his fellow men, he possessed a character worthy of all emulation and left memories to be cherished throughout all the many years to come.

Following the insistent impulses of his nature he ever sought graver duties and higher achievements. From early manhood he was almost continuously engaged in the services of his State and Nation.

In 1864 he enlisted in the United States Marine Corps and rose to be a noncommissioned officer in the service. In 1914 he was elected, for the sixth time, to membership of the American Congress, wherein he became a commanding figure and rendered service of great value to his country. He was appointed a member of this board in 1902, and at the time of his death was the oldest member in service. In 1914 he was elected its president.

In his official capacity he sought only the highest good of this institution and the permanent uplift of its members. He was beloved of his associates on this board, in his rare and genial presence all found pleasure and profit, and in his death each has sustained a personal and irreparable loss: Therefore

Resolved, That we, the members of this board, for ourselves and for the officers and members of this home, deeply deplore the untimely death of Col. GOULDEN, and record here our belief in his unqualified loyalty to this institution and to its officers and members, our faith in his integrity and uprightness as a man, and our admiration for his life and character.

Resolved, That this minute be made a part of the permanent records of this institution, and that a copy of the same be forwarded to the family of the deceased, to whom, for ourselves and for those whom we have the honor to represent, we extend our deepest sympathy and condolence.

Adopted July 15, 1915.

Acting President.

Secretary pro tempore.

In memoriam on the death of Brother JOSEPH A. GOULDEN. Resolutions unanimously adopted by Taneytown Grange No. 184 in regular session, May 11, 1915.

As we meet together this evening there is a profound sorrow because of the death of our brother, Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, a great statesman, a valiant soldier, a devout Christian, and a true neighbor. During the war he was an officer in the United States Navy. For several terms he was commander of the G. A. R. of New York.

The war for the Union over, in peace as in war, his time and talents were at the command of his country, and step by step again he rose from the humble voter in the ranks until an overwhelming majority of his fellow citizens called him to be a Member of the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C.

As a member of our grange, he always had its interest at heart and was one whose presence as master of ceremonies at the annual grange fair added largely to the success of the literary program.

In the Subordinate and Pomona Grange he was a molder of opinions and a director of thoughts. So long as this grange stands, so long will his influence exist and his loss be keenly felt.

Of the man there is no need to speak. His life was devoted to helping neighbors. The deep sense of personal loss with which his sudden demise struck all who knew him testifies more strongly to the hold he had upon the people he loved than could any mere empty words of grief; and from every heart, while torn with sorrow, comes the fitting epitaph: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

It is ordered that the charter of Taneytown Grange No. 184 be draped for 60 days, and that this memoriam be entered upon the minutes of the grange, published in the Carroll Record, and a copy be sent to the family.

It is further ordered that a page in the annual Grange Fair Catalogue be set aside to his memory, and as a mark of respect for the public spirit he always manifested in the grange fair, be it ordered that August 10, 1915, at 10 a. m., the opening services of the fair shall be a memorial service; that the flag be raised at half mast, and all exhibitors, concession people, and all business of any kind be suspended during said service and the public be invited to join in this service.

The Penn Mutual Agency Association has sustained a great loss in the death of Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, who for 36 years was closely identified with the company in many important capacities. The summons came to him on May 3, 1915, in the city of Philadelphia, where he had gone to attend meetings of the executive committee and the board of trustees. Col. GOULDEN first became associated with the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company at Pittsburgh, Pa., on October 21, 1875, as superintendent of eastern agencies. Upon his removal in 1887 to New York City, he was appointed general agent. For many years he was vice president of the Penn Mutual Agency Association and was acting president at the time of his death. He was elected a member of the board of trustees in October, 1914, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Col. Markoe, of Baltimore. He filled these responsible positions with distinguished ability and marked success. He was elected to Congress in 1902 from the most populous district in the country, and he served for five full terms and a portion of the sixth term. He was interested in many State movements for the public good. Every question that touched the people was his concern, and in all his labors he commanded the confidence and esteem of his associates. His gospel was the gospel of good cheer, and his gracious smile and warm hand grasp will be sadly missed. Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN served in the Navy during the Civil War. He was trustee for many years of the Soldiers and Sailors' Home and recently was president and had been officially and creditably connected with many organizations because of his keen interest in Grand Army affairs. In Col. GOULDEN'S death we mourn the loss of an upright man, a loyal friend, a wise and faithful counselor.

Asleep amidst the familiar scenes of his summer home at Taneytown, Md., we bid him a long farewell. May he rest in sweet peace.

NEW YORK, May 17, 1915.

Mrs. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN,
2433 Creston Avenue, New York City.

DEAR MRS. GOULDEN: In accordance with action taken by the board of education at its meeting held on May 12, I send you herewith a copy of the tribute to the late Mr. GOULDEN prepared by Mr. Frank D. Wilsey and unanimously adopted by the board by a rising vote.

In doing so I can not refrain from expressing my personal sympathy to you and your family. While I was not connected with the board of education when Mr. GOULDEN was a member, I met him on a number of occasions and was well aware of his deep interest in the public schools. It was always a pleasure to meet him, and I regret that my opportunities for doing so were not more frequent.

Again assuring you of my sympathy, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

A. EMERSON PALMER,
Secretary Board of Education.

It seems appropriate that action should be taken by the board of education with reference to the death of Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, which occurred very suddenly in Philadelphia on May 3, 1915, because at various times he was officially connected with the public-school system, and also because of his deep interest, extending over many years, in the well-being of the schools of this city. He was apparently in good health and as active as usual in his customary pursuits up to the moment when he was stricken.

Mr. GOULDEN was born in Pennsylvania, August 1, 1844. Before he attained his majority he enlisted in the Marine Corps of the United States Navy, serving therein in 1864 and 1865. In 1892 he was appointed by Mayor Hugh J. Grant a member of the board of education of the former city of New York, and was active in its work for his term of three years, 1893–1895, being a member of the committees on teachers, sites and new buildings, school furniture, nomination of trustees, supplies and school system, and also a member of the executive committee of the College of the City of New York.

In 1902 he was appointed a member of the local school board of district No. 25, and was chairman of that board until October, 1903, when he resigned, prior to taking his seat in the House of Representatives at Washington. Mr. GOULDEN served as a Member of Congress from March 4, 1903, until his death, with the exception of one term.

Having been a teacher in early life, Mr. GOULDEN'S interest in everything relating to the public schools was intense, regardless of whether or not he was officially connected with the educational department. One instance of this interest is found in the work which he undertook some 15 years ago in providing busts of George Washington for the schools in the Borough of The Bronx. In 1901 Mr. Frank Tilford presented copies of the Houdon bust of Washington to all the public schools in Manhattan. Shortly thereafter a movement was started in the interest of The Bronx schools, of which Mr. GOULDEN was the most active promoter.

Mr. GOULDEN served as a member of the board of managers of the State Reformatory at Morganza, Pa.; as a member of the board of trustees at the soldiers' home at Bath, N. Y.; and was secretary of the commission which erected the Soldiers and Sailors' Monument on Riverside Drive.

In the death of Mr. GOULDEN the public schools of this city, and especially those of The Bronx, have lost a most sincere well-wisher and supporter, and not a few of our principals, teachers, and pupils must feel that they have lost a personal friend.

Resolved, That the foregoing be adopted as an inadequate expression of the feeling entertained by the board of education by reason of the lamented death of Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, and that a copy of the same be transmitted to his family.

At a regular meeting of the Mosholu Catholic Club, held Tuesday evening, May 4, 1915, the following preambles and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN having departed this life on May 3, 1915; and

"Whereas he always was a loyal friend and supporter of this club; and

"Whereas the members of this club desire to express their deep sorrow upon his sudden death; be it

"Resolved, That the members of the Mosholu Catholic Club keenly feel his loss and hereby tender to his family their heartfelt sympathy and condolence in this hour of their bereavement; and, be it further

"Resolved, That these resolutions be spread at length upon the minutes of this meeting and a copy forwarded to the family of the late Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN."

Resolutions adopted by the Harlem Luncheon Association.

Whereas on the 3d day of May, 1915, Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN departed this life, and, by resolution duly passed at the meeting of the Harlem Luncheon Association, held on the 12th day of May, 1915, it was

Resolved, That out of respect to the memory of the deceased gentleman suitable action should be taken to mark the high regard in which he was held during his lifetime.

Resolved, That we deeply deplore his death and extend to his widow and children our deep sympathy in the hour of their great grief.

Resolved, That a copy of these preambles and resolutions be forwarded to the widow of the deceased gentleman.

Attest:

MEMORIAL CONCERNING THE DEATH OF HON. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, WHICH OCCURRED ON MONDAY, THE THIRD DAY OF MAY.

(Prepared and presented by Hon. JAMES L. WELLS.)

At a regular meeting of The Bronx Board of Trade, held this 26th day of May, 1915, the following memorial concerning the death of Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, which occurred on Monday, the 3d day of May, was unanimously adopted and copies thereof, signed by the president and attested by the secretary, were directed to be transmitted to the family of the deceased and to the public press:

MEMORIAL.

"The members of The Bronx Board of Trade, in the city of New York, hereby express and record their profound sorrow for the great loss which they, in common with people of our borough, city, State, and Nation, have experienced in the sudden death of Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, the distinguished Representative of the twenty-third district of New York in the Congress of the United States, a charter member and for many years an active vice president and a faithful and conscientious director of this organization.

"The life of Col. GOULDEN is a splendid illustration of a noble patriotic American citizen. As a volunteer in the war for the preservation of the Union, as a public instructor and a life-long champion of popular education, as a manager of the Pennsylvania State Reformatory, as the secretary of the commission that erected the beautiful Soldiers and Sailors' Monument on Riverside Drive, as a trustee of the New York Soldiers and Sailors' Home, as a commissioner of education of the city of New York, as a Representative in Congress for 12 years, and as a member of this board, deeply interested in the development of The Bronx, Col. GOULDEN rendered services of inestimable value to the people.

"He was assiduous and untiring in the performance of his public duties and conspicuous for his intelligence, his wide experience, his sincerity of purpose, his sound judgment, and his moral courage. His genial manner and his uniform courtesy, his innumerable acts of kindness, his broad and liberal views, his generous consideration of the opinion and the rights of others, his purity of life, and his unswerving belief in an overruling Providence guiding the destiny of men and nations—these are the qualities that endeared him to the people. These are the essential elements of his character that will long perpetuate his memory.

"'The night dew that falls,
Though in silence it weeps,
Shall brighten with verdure
The grave where he sleeps;
And the tear that we shed,
Though in silence it rolls,
Shall long keep his memory
Green in our souls.'

"The members of The Bronx Board of Trade, individually and as a body, tender their sincere and deepest sympathy to the bereaved widow and family of Col. GOULDEN. In recognition of his many important public services and as further testimony to the nobility of his manhood and the high esteem in which the memory of our departed associate is held, it is hereby directed that this memorial be inscribed in full upon the records of this board."

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 15, 1915.

Mrs. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN,
2433 Creston Avenue, Bronx, New York City.

DEAR MRS. GOULDEN: At the regular meeting of Potomac Council, Knights of Columbus, of a recent date, the attention of the council was called to the demise of your highly esteemed husband.

In behalf of the council, I was directed to convey to you the sincere and heartfelt sympathy of the council, and to express to you the great loss our order has sustained in his sudden departure from this life.

We are not unmindful of the great work he accomplished in presenting and by his untiring energy having the Columbus Monument bill passed by the United States Congress. It is with a deep sense of gratitude we recall his successful efforts in this matter.

To some of us who knew him personally, and had an opportunity to appreciate his noble and lofty character, we can but say the world has lost a noble man.

Trusting the good Lord may comfort you in the time of your great loss, and again extending our sincere sympathy, we are,

Very truly and sincerely, yours,

POTOMAC COUNCIL, No. 433, K. OF C., P. L. O'BRIEN, Recorder.

BRONX CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
New York, May 29, 1915.

Mrs. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN,
2433 Creston Avenue, Bronx.

DEAR MADAM: In compliance with the will of the chamber I have the honor of presenting the following resolution recently adopted:

"Whereas Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, a resident of The Bronx for most of his life, a Member of Congress for a long number of years, and always identified with and working for not only the interests of the Bronx, but those of the entire American people, has suddenly passed away; and

"Whereas the members of the Bronx Chamber of Commerce, in meeting held this 22d day of May, 1915, do recognize the true worth of the deceased: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the members of the said chamber of commerce unanimously, and with heartfelt sympathy, extend to Mrs. Joseph A. Goulden and family their condolences."

Respectfully, yours,

J. M. TAYLOR, Secretary.

NEW YORK CITY, May 17, 1915.

Mrs. J. A. GOULDEN,
2433 Creston Avenue, Fordham.

DEAR MADAM: In behalf of the members of Ladies' Auxiliary No. 1, I beg to extend to you our heartfelt sympathy for the death of your dearly beloved husband. He was the true friend of all who needed him and will be mourned by many. In your great bereavement we trust it will be a comfort to you to feel that those whom God wishes most He calls suddenly to Him.

In sympathy and hoping God will lighten your grief, we beg to remain,

Sincerely, your friends,

LADIES' AUXILIARY No. 1,
KATE L. WHITE,
Recording Secretary.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, many of our colleagues, for one reason or another, are not able to be here to-day, and I, as well as yourself, have had personal requests from a number that they may have the usual leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD. I therefore ask unanimous consent that during the next five legislative days those who were present and those who for one reason or another are detained from this Hall to-day may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD upon the life, character, and public services of the late Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HULBERT). The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the Members of the House may have five legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In accordance with the resolution heretofore adopted, the House will stand adjourned.

Accordingly, at 1 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m., the House adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, January 24, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thy peace lies deeper than the noise and confusion of the world's dread alarm. Thy peace is as a tide, too deep for sound and foam. We know that the world's peace waits upon the peace of God in the hearts of men. We come before Thee to open our hearts, that our minds and hearts may be kept in perfect peace by Thy grace, that we may know that which passeth knowledge of the peace of God in our hearts. Grant, we pray, that with calmness of thought and with a devotion to the highest interests of mankind we can quietly and consistently with Thy will perform the duties of this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

EDWIN C. BURLEIGH, a Senator from the State of Maine, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS (H. DOC. NO. 613).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of documents and files of papers in the Department of Commerce which are not needed or are useful in the transaction of current business and which have no permanent value or historical interest. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, and the Chair appoints the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] the committee on the part of the Senate. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives of the appointment thereof.

LIST OF CLAIMS (S. DOC. NO. 97).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting, pursuant to the order of the court, a list of cases referred to the court by resolution of the Senate under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act, which cases were dismissed by the court on the motion of the claimants' attorneys, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also transmitted to the Senate resolutions of the House on the death of Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN, late a Representative from the State of New York.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 1773. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near Warfield, Ky., and Kermit, W. Va.;

H. R. 4716. An act to authorize Dunklin County, Mo., and Clay County, Ark., to construct a bridge across St. Francis River; and

H. R. 6448. An act to authorize Butler and Dunklin Counties, Mo., to construct a bridge across St. Francis River.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. OLIVER. I send to the desk a short communication from the Pennsylvania State Association of Dyers and Cleaners requesting action looking to an investigation of the causes of the advanced price of gasoline. I ask that the communication be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PENNSYLVANIA STATE ASSOCIATION OF DYERS AND CLEANERS,
Pittsburgh, Pa., January 18, 1916.

Hon. GEORGE T. OLIVER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a convention of the Pennsylvania State Association of Dyers and Cleaners held in Wilkes-Barre, Pa., a few days ago, a resolution was passed favoring an investigation by the Government of the rapid and continuous increase in the price of "gasoline" by the refiners.

Our industry uses millions of gallons of this article and we believe the present advance of practically 100 per cent is uncalled for. I, as secretary of the association, was instructed to bring this matter to your notice.

Thanking you in advance for any trouble we may cause you,

I remain,

THOMAS W. MURPHY,
Secretary Pennsylvania State Association of Dyers and Cleaners.

Mr. OLIVER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Apollo, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to place a prohibitive tax on intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 85) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States for the election of President and Vice President by direct vote; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment to S. 381, the so-called Philippine government bill, and ask that it may be printed and also printed in the RECORD. I will say, if permitted to do so, that I offer it as a substitute for all the amendments I have heretofore offered on this subject. I have revised it somewhat and amplified it slightly. I think it now presents the views of those who think something should be done in the matter at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator have any objection to having it read at this time?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Not the slightest. I shall be very glad to include in my request that it shall be read at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The amendment was read and ordered to be printed, as follows:

SEC. —. The President is hereby authorized and directed to withdraw and surrender all right of possession, supervision, jurisdiction, control, or sovereignty now existing and exercised by the United States in and over the territory and people of the Philippines, and he shall on behalf of the United States fully recognize the independence of the said Philippines as a separate and self-governing nation and acknowledge the authority and control over the same of the government instituted by the people thereof. This transfer of possession, sovereignty, and governmental control shall be completed and become absolute not less than two years nor more than four years from the date of the approval of this act, under the terms and in the manner hereinafter prescribed: Provided, That if the President, at the expiration of the said period of four years, shall find that the condition of the internal or external affairs of said Philippines in respect to the stability or efficiency of the proposed government thereof is such as to warrant him in so doing, he is hereby further authorized, by proclamation duly made and published, to extend the said time to and including the date of the final adjournment of the session of Congress which shall convene next after the date of the expiration of the said period of four years, and thus afford the Congress an opportunity in its discretion to further consider the situation in the said Philippines; but any such extension of time by the President shall not otherwise suspend or nullify the operative force of this act, unless the Congress shall hereafter so direct. For the purpose of a complete and prompt compliance with this direction, the President is hereby invested with full power and authority to make such orders and regulations and to enter into such negotiations with the authorities of said Philippines or others as may be necessary to finally settle and adjust all property rights and other relations as between the United States and the said Philippines, and to cause to be acknowledged, respected, and safeguarded all of the personal and property rights of citizens or corporations of the United States resident or engaged in business in said Philippines or having property interests therein. In any such settlement or adjustment so made in respect to the rights and property of the United States as against the said Philippines the President shall reserve or acquire such lands and rights and privileges appurtenant thereto as may, in his judgment, be required by the United States for naval bases and coaling stations within the territory of said Philippines.

Immediately upon the passage of the act, the President shall invite the cooperation of the principal nations interested in the affairs of that part of the world in which the Philippines are located, in the form of a treaty or other character of binding agreement, whereby the cooperating nations shall mutually pledge themselves to recognize and respect the sovereignty and independence of the said Philippines, and also to mutually obligate themselves, equally and not one primarily nor to any greater extent than another, to maintain as against external force the sovereignty of said Philippines. If any of the nations so invited to join the United States in such undertaking shall decline to do so, then the President shall include as parties to such convention or agreement such nations as may be willing to join therein and to assume such obligations; and if none are willing to so unite therein, then the President is authorized to give such guaranty on behalf of the United States alone for the period of five years from and after the expiration of said period of four years, or any extension thereof, and pending the existence of such separate guaranty by the United States, the United States shall be entitled to retain and exercise such control and supervision in the said Philippines as may be necessary to enforce order therein and to avoid external complications.

STOCK-RAISING HOMESTEADS.

Mr. BORAH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1053) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MUNITIONS OF WAR.

Mr. ROBINSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. ——) to provide a tax on munitions of war manufactured in the United States and to amend the act of Congress approved October 22, 1914, entitled "An act to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes," which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1107) to amend, revise, and codify the laws relating to public printing and binding and distribution of Government publications, which was referred to the Committee on Printing and ordered to be printed.

THE JUDICIAL CODE.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1412) further to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CURTIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1412) further to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,250 for rental of additional quarters in the District of Columbia for the Navy Department during the remainder of the fiscal year 1916, intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 9416), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the continuous spread of the white pine blister, rust, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 9416), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBINSON submitted an amendment proposing to set aside from the several appropriations for protection, improvement, and management, etc., of the various national parks, including the Hot Springs Reservation, such sum or sums as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary to be expended in the employment of competent persons in the District of Columbia and in the field, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 9416), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE FRIGATE "CONSTITUTION."

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 76) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to communicate to the Senate all facts bearing on the present condition of the frigate Constitution, now lying in the Charles River, Boston, and also an estimate of the amount of money that will be required to put the frigate in a condition of good repair, with a view of retaining the vessel as a historic relic of the early days of the American Navy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. STONE. Let it go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

EMPLOYMENT OF ASSISTANT CLERK.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 77), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an additional assistant clerk at $1,200 per annum, to be paid from "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 78), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interoceanic Canals be authorized to employ a stenographer temporarily and that the said stenographer be paid at the rate of $50 per month for each day of such employment, not exceeding four months, and that such services be paid for out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN THE TROPICS.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I send to the desk a pamphlet entitled "Self-Government in the Tropics," by Samuel L. Parrish, and request that it be referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to the printing of it as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION (S. DOC. NO. 250).

Mr. CHILTON. I ask that there be printed as a document certain extracts from reports of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor in the Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, and Fifty-first Congresses, favorably recommending the passage of resolutions for the submission of the question of national constitutional prohibition to the several States of the Union, together with a letter from ex-Senator Henry W. Blair, of New Hampshire, to Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, United States Senator from Texas, relating thereto. I have had an estimate made and find that it will cost about $50.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask that 2,000 additional copies of the document be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 9416. An act making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LANDS IN NEVADA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

The bill (S. 2520) granting to the State of Nevada 7,000,000 acres of land in said State for the use and benefit of the public schools of Nevada and the State university of the State of Nevada was announced as first in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I have asked that the bill go over this morning.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the bill has been at the head of the calendar for a month. It is a simple measure. I submit that it is not fair for the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to constantly object to its consideration. The bill has been attacked through the newspapers of this town, and that attack is having its effect. Nearly every western Senator has been attacked on account of the bill, and bills similar to it. I do not think it fair to western Senators to permit this attack to go on as it has done, and not to be answered at this time. So I ask the Senator from Utah, for that reason, to allow the bill to be taken up at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have previously stated to the Senator from Nevada that the Senator from New Mexico desires to speak on the bill, and that Senator is now absent from the Chamber. I therefore ask that the bill go over until the Senator from New Mexico shall be present.

Mr. PITTMAN. Do I understand the Senator from New Mexico to whom the Senator from Utah refers to be Senator FALL?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. And that that Senator is now sick?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether or not the Senator is sick, but he is not now in the Chamber.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, after the bill has been on the calendar for a month, and we have tried to get it considered and disposed of, after it has been a dozen times passed over at the request of the Senator from Utah, it seems to me that the Senator from New Mexico has had sufficient opportunity to be present and to discuss the bill if he desires to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I told the Senator from Nevada that I should object to the consideration of the bill, and I have done so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1053) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S.1062) relating to the duties of registers of United States land offices and the publication in newspapers of official land-office notices was announced as next in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 706) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 609) to aid in the erection of a monument to Pocahontas at Jamestown, Va., was announced as next in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 611) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Matthew Fontaine Maury, of Virginia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States conferring upon women the right of suffrage was announced as next in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Being objected to, the joint resolution goes over.

The bill (S. 707) for the relief of Beverly E. Whitehead was announced as next in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce was announced as next in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) to provide for holding the San Antonio Bicentennial Exposition in 1918 was announced as next in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over.

The bill (S. 2406) to amend section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (S. 3518) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill just announced on the calendar, which is a pension bill, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Nevada.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. PITTMAN. I move as a substitute for that motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration——

Mr. GALLINGER. The motion is not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question first comes on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. I raise a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PITTMAN. My point of order is that a motion of this kind is not in order until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, and before the calendar has been thoroughly called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is overruled. It is a rule of the Senate that at the conclusion of morning business, or if morning business has not been concluded by the hour of 1 o'clock, a motion may be made to take up any bill on the calendar; and, once having been made, a motion to substitute some other bill is not in order. The motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill must first be passed on. The question now, therefore, is——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in order that I may understand what the ruling of the Chair is, I desire to ask, does the Chair rule that before 1 o'clock, if morning business is closed, a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill on the calendar can be made?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does so rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no doubt about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was forced to that conclusion by the Senator from Utah at the last session of Congress on a former ruling of the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, whether the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3518. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask that the title of the bill be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3518) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP (when his named was called). In the absence of my general pair, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when the name of Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota was called). I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON] on account of illness.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). In the absence of my general pair, the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is absent, but is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I desire this announcement to stand for all votes to-day.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). In the absence of my general pair, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness, as is also the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. They are both paired.

Mr. COLT. In the absence of my general pair, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I have already voted, but I have ascertained that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, is absent. I therefore transfer my pair to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. OLIVER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. PENROSE] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. If he were present and at liberty to vote, my colleague would vote "yea." I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] is necessarily absent and that he is paired with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CATRON (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY], who is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

Mr. BURLEIGH. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I am about to vote. I will therefore take the liberty of voting. I vote "yea."

Mr. REED. I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. STONE. I announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

The result was announced—yeas 56, nays 12, as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President, on page 14 I move to strike out lines 11, 12, 13, and 14, the pensioner having died.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14 it is proposed to strike out lines 11, 12, 13, and 14, in the following words:

The name of Marion Clemans, late of Company A, Twenty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

FEDERAL JUDGES.

The resolution (S. Res. 66) directing the Judiciary Committee of the Senate to make inquiry and report the number of Federal judges now holding office who are unable to discharge substantially the duties of a judge, etc., was next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, has Senate joint resolution 60 been called?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and it was passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been passed over.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Would it be in order for me to move to take up the joint resolution at this time?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, what action was taken on the resolution just read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to put the question when interrupted by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was on the floor, but did not observe that the joint resolution had been passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. So soon as this resolution is disposed of it will be in order for any Senator to make a motion to take up any bill on the calendar. The question is on agreeing to Senate resolution 66.

The resolution was agreed to.

INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 33, being Senate joint resolution 60.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me? I wish to say that I hope he will not make that motion this morning. I desire to look at the resolution, and I have not the time, of course, to do so now.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I called up the joint resolution the other day, and was told that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] wished to offer an amendment; and I consented to have the matter go over until he could have an opportunity to do so. It is important that the resolution should be considered. I can not tell at what stage other business may intervene to prevent its consideration, and I beg the Senator not to insist upon a further postponement. I think I have shown sufficient consideration for those who wished to address themselves to the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada withdraw his motion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I must press my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, then, is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All in favor of proceeding to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 60 will rise. [A pause.] All opposed will rise. [A pause.] The ayes have it, and the Chair lays the joint resolution before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. CHILTON. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. BORAH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BRADY] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas a number of bills are now pending in Congress, having for their object the further regulation of carriers engaged in interstate commerce; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission has, from time to time, made recommendations to Congress in relation to the general subject of regulation, some of which are now under consideration but have not yet been acted on; and

Whereas a system of governmental regulation of interstate commerce has now been in effect for 28 years, during which period the extent and powers of regulation have been, from time to time, varied and enlarged, and there has thus been accumulated valuable experience for the guidance of Congress in the premises; and

Whereas the growth of interstate commerce and the enlargement of the powers and duties of regulation have so increased the exactions on the Interstate Commerce Commission as to necessitate, in the public interest, the consideration of the best method of dealing with the situation and of expediting the public business; and

Whereas adequate and well-managed transportation facilities constitute a prime necessity of business prosperity and are a common interest of all the people, and in order to afford these facilities and to enlarge them as the needs of commerce increase the credit of the carriers and proper regulation of their operations are matters of fundamental public concern; and

Whereas as a basis for any further legislation that may be undertaken by Congress in this regard the whole subject of governmental regulation should be deliberately and thoroughly studied in the light of the experience and suggestions of the Interstate Commerce Commission, of the carriers, of the shippers, and of the general public, with a view to adequately safeguarding the interests of the public, securing the establishment and maintenance of transportation facilities adequate to the needs of a growing and expanding commerce, and assuring to private owners and the investing public just consideration and protection of their legitimate rights of property: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate and the Committee of the House of Representatives on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, through a joint subcommittee to consist of five Senators and five Representatives, who shall be selected by said committees, respectively, be, and they hereby are, appointed to investigate and report upon the subject of the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, with authority to sit during the recess of Congress and with power to summon witnesses, to appoint necessary experts, clerks, and stenographers, and to do whatever is necessary for a full and comprehensive examination and study of the subject and report to Congress on or before the third Monday in December next; that a sum sufficient to carry out the purposes of this resolution and to pay the necessary expenses of the subcommittee and its members is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Said appropriation shall be immediately available and shall be paid out on the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said subcommittee, which audit and order shall be conclusive and binding upon all departments as to the correctness of the accounts of such subcommittee.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with an amendment as follows:

On page 3, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "and report upon the subject of the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce" and insert "the subject of the Government control and regulation of interstate and foreign transportation, the efficiency of the existing system in protecting the rights of shippers and carriers and in promoting the public interest, the incorporation or control of the incorporation of carriers, and all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the act to regulate commerce."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement regarding this joint resolution.

The purpose of the resolution is to make an exhaustive inquiry regarding interstate and foreign transportation, similar to the inquiry made by the National Monetary Commission regarding finance and banking. The resolution, however, does not provide for a commission, but for a subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committees of the House and the Senate—5 Members from each; 10 in all.

Numerous bills have been introduced in both Houses looking to the regulation of railway securities, the increase in the membership and the division into branches or departments of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the national incorporation of great interstate railway systems, the relations between rail and water carriers, both river and ocean. The proposals were so numerous and varied, and the difference of opinion regarding them so great, that it was thought the coordinating of the committees of the Senate and House having jurisdiction of interstate transportation would be instrumental in focusing the attention of Congress upon definite measures which would be framed after full hearing and discussion. Such measures would then go to the committees themselves for consideration and report to the respective bodies. The President had favored this view and had recommended action upon these lines. The proposed resolution provides for a subcommittee to be appointed from the committees of the Senate and House having jurisdiction of the subject.

The resolution as originally introduced had provided in general terms for the investigation of the general subject of the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce. The committee by its amendment had changed this phraseology so as to authorize the committee to—investigate the subject of Government control and regulation of interstate and foreign transportation, the efficiency of the existing system in protecting the rights of shippers and carriers, and in promoting the public interest; the incorporation or control of the incorporation of carriers and all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission and act to regulate commerce.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] by his proposed amendment seeks to amend this by adding:

The subject of Government ownership of public utilities, such as telegraph, telephone, express companies, and railroads engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and report as to the wisdom or feasibility of Government ownership of such utilities, and the comparative worth or efficiency of Government regulation and control as compared with Government ownership and regulation.

I contend, Mr. President, that it would be much better to confine the proposed investigation to the question of Government regulation. That regulation has been thus far, in my judgment, highly successful, and it can be made more efficient through proper legislation. Unless, of course, regulation involves not only reasonable rates to the shippers but fair returns to the carriers, it will fail of its purpose, for a fair return to the carriers is essential in order to secure the investment of money in needed extensions and improvements, and unless the regulation results in fair rates to the shippers, the whole public purpose of the regulation fails. Logically we should complete and perfect public regulation before the question of public ownership is taken up. To investigate both questions at this time, when there are no fair methods of judgment or comparison, would produce confusion instead of certainty.

Of late years, until the foreign war stimulated the business of the country, the transportation interests had suffered, as have the other business interests of the country. Prior to the European war there was a gradual let down in business, industry, and production, which was necessarily reflected in the reduction of transportation. There has been no period in the history of transportation for the last 20 years in which the problem, so far as the finances of the railroads were concerned, was so serious. The railroads, having lost the political control which they once exercised, and being forced into the forum of public opinion, thought it wise to present their case to the public through addresses, pamphlets, and newspaper and magazine publications. The situation was one of diminishing traffic and increasing wages and taxes. They perhaps overstated their case, and the result was that whilst perhaps their appeals in a measure affected the public judgment and moderated governmental action regarding their activities, the effect was to alarm their own stockholders and investors generally in railway securities and make it difficult for them to obtain the money needed for extensions and improvements. There had been no period in this generation, outside of the panic year of 1907, when it was so difficult for them to secure money. The negotiation of long-time bonds was impossible. The negotiation of short-time notes at high rates of interest was necessary, and the maturing of those notes from time to time increased their embarrassment.

The recent revival of industry has, of course, affected them favorably, and they are now approaching a time when it will be easier to make their negotiations; but all such negotiations would be hampered by a consideration and discussion of important questions relating to their regulation and control at a time when a presidential campaign is approaching and when the general inclination of both parties is to take a political rather than an economic view of such questions.

Besides this there are so many questions now pending before Congress relating to the civil war in Mexico and the international war abroad—questions of preparedness and questions of revenue—that it would be difficult to get a full consideration of the questions relating to transportation either by committees or by Congress. It appears wise, therefore, whilst providing for an intermediate inquiry, to postpone definite action until the period of calm shall come after the presidential election.

The language of the resolution is sufficiently broad to cover every possible inquiry regarding transportation without accentuating such inquiry as that which relates to Government ownership, an inquiry which might have the effect of producing uncertainty in arrangements that are now pending for the immediate financing of many railroads. I feel sure that logically full consideration of Government ownership should only come after the question of public regulation has been exhausted and its incompetency and inefficiency demonstrated. So far as I am concerned I feel greater confidence in the success of public regulation than ever. We have under it secured the most perfect railway system in the country with more reasonable rates of freight and fare than prevail anywhere in the world, and whilst there are still imperfections to be remedied it is evident that governmental ownership elsewhere had not evolved a system at all comparable with ours.

I refer to these considerations for the purpose of stating that, in my judgment, it is of the highest importance, both to the public, the shippers, and to the carriers themselves, that we should arrive at some rational solution of all the pending proposals without public excitement upon the subject. I think it would be a mistake to take up all the questions now by the respective committees of the Senate and House when both Congress and the country are intent more upon political than economic action and when the questions relating to existing international and civil war are so engrossing. It seems to me that the regulation of carriers is now reaching its crucial state. The carriers have found it difficult during this period to meet the demands of the country for expansion and enlargement, and that is a condition which is unfavorable to the shippers and to the business of the country.

I believe that public regulation is a success. I believe that it can be improved so as to make it more successful not only in the interest of the shippers themselves but in the interest of the carriers and with reference to the expansion and development of the railroad system to meet the requirements of the country. If the public regulation of railroads does not succeed, if it breaks down in any way, Government ownership must follow; but it seems to me that Government ownership can not logically be considered until the failure of public regulation is established.

Therefore, whilst the language of this resolution as reported by the committee would be broad enough if the committee saw fit to consider any well-considered scheme of Government ownership and report upon it, I would regard it as ill-advised to accept the amendment of the Senator from Idaho regarding the Government ownership of all public utilities. I believe that it would accentuate that form of governmental control. I do not believe that the committee will have time to enter upon that subject as it ought and make its proper recommendations with reference to the improvement of the regulation of the railroads of the country. Such an inquiry will be a very extensive one when made, involving an inquiry at very great expense, not only into local conditions but into conditions throughout the world, a careful examination of all the prevailing systems of Government ownership, and a comparison with our own.

I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, not so much because I am disinclined at some time to enter upon such an inquiry, but simply because I think this is not the time logically for it, and I would not wish to emphasize in the public mind the idea that the Congress of the United States regards public regulation as a failure and is now prepared to enter upon the consideration of Government ownership.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand that in the absence of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] the Senator from Nevada is offering the amendment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; the Senator from Idaho has been here. I supposed he was here. He was here when I commenced my remarks.

Mr. BRYAN. May I inquire of the Senator from Nevada if the language printed in italics is what he refers to when speaking of the Borah amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; the Borah amendment is a separate printed amendment. The amendment in italics is the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho has offered no amendment. The Chair heard the Senator from Nevada read it, and was in doubt as to whether the Senator from Nevada intended to offer it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that I understood the Senator from Idaho had given notice that he would offer it, and I thought it proper in my preliminary remarks to call attention to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada why it was that the proposed law carrying out the platform pledge of his party, as I understood it was for that purpose, providing for the regulation of stocks and bonds of interstate railroads, was allowed to die after it had passed the House and then been reported by the Senate committee and placed on the calendar of the Senate? Why is it that now we should want to make an investigation as to whether we ought to pass anything of that kind when I supposed it had been determined at least by the Senator's own party that such a law was necessary?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the Senator that a bill was passed in the House of Representatives providing for the control by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the securities issued by interstate carriers. That bill came to the Senate and was reported to the Senate with amendments. The understanding of the committee when that report was made was that the bill provided for the absolute control by the Interstate Commerce Commission, a national authority, of the securities of railway carriers, and it was assumed, though it was not expressed in the bill in that connection, that under the decision of the Supreme Court such a control exercised under national authority would practically oust the jurisdiction of the State commissions regarding the securities of carriers engaged in interstate commerce but organized under the laws of the respective States. After that report was made Mr. Brandeis and Mr. Rublee appeared before the Interstate Commerce Commission and urged that it would be exceedingly unwise to provide for the absolute control of these securities; that in some way the Nation might be committed to existing issues which might have been unlawfully or wrongfully made and would be estopped from attacking them hereafter; and they insisted upon it that the supervision of the national commission should be confined simply to requiring statements from these carriers to the Interstate Commerce Commission and their full publicity, thus relying upon publicity as a control and a corrective rather than upon the absolute control of the commission. The views of Mr. Brandeis were sustained by some of the members of the committee, whose attention, I presume, had for the first time been called to the importance of the subject, and it was apparent that unless the matter were reconsidered by the committee there would be a long and protracted debate on the floor of the Senate over that question.

We were then toward the close of a long session, during which the most important questions relating to banking and trade had been considered. Congress was wearied and it was thought inadvisable to press the bill at that Congress. That Congress was followed by the last session, a short session, and then as the result of mutual consultation, particularly upon this side of the House, with reference to a legislative program which could be put through in so short a session, it was not deemed wise to bring up that measure.

We are now in a long session, but we are approaching a political campaign, and, as the Senator knows, politics have much more consideration in such a Congress, and always have had, than economics. It is therefore deemed wise to have both committees, through a subcommittee, act upon all these various measures that have been presented with a view to sifting them thoroughly, holding public hearings and making a report as soon as practicable, thus presenting to their respective committees their concrete judgment as to the measures to be enacted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator another question before he sits down. Does the Senator believe that the Senate and Congress and the President and the entire country ought to suspend operations after it was, I think, conceded, at least by the Senator's party and a great many others, including myself, that it ought to be passed, after it had passed the House and been reported favorably by his committee to the Senate, because two men, Mr. Brandeis and Mr. Rublee, appeared before the committee and requested suspension of action, that the entire country ought to halt and wait? If it be true that it was only a question of waiting, why is it that at the beginning of this Congress the Senator and his committee having had all the information before it did not propose the bill that had so nearly been passed before? Why is it necessary to investigate further?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Nevada will allow me, I desire to say that while I am sure the chairman of the committee wishes to be absolutely accurate, as a member of the committee and one who has heard the statement that he has just made, I am bound to dissent from some of its details. I can not agree that the Committee on Interstate Commerce suspended or abandoned the bill which the Senator from Nebraska refers to because it did not meet the views of Mr. Brandeis and Mr. Rublee. Whatever effect their views may have had on members of the committee, I am sure the Senator from Nevada does not mean to say that the committee itself accepted the opinions of these gentlemen, eminent as they are, and through their advice or influence reached the conclusion that no further efforts would be made to pass the bill. There were some of us who were very anxious that the bill should be pressed at all times, not only during the latter part of the long session but during the short session as well.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not think the words which I used could convey the impression at all that we suspended operations simply because Mr. Brandeis and Mr. Rublee appeared before our committee. There were several members of the committee who had given most thorough and conscientious consideration to all the railway problems that have involved us for years who seemed inclined to sympathize with that view. It was perfectly apparent that a long debate and contention would take place over the bill and that it would be impossible to conclude it at the long session of Congress.

I will further state that the business of the committee is not suspended and will not be suspended by the adoption of this joint resolution. It is entirely within the province of the Interstate Commerce Committee to take up any of the measures that are now pending before it.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Nevada permit me to ask him another question there?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. If the passage of this joint resolution will not suspend the operations of the committee, I should like to ask the Senator if, notwithstanding the passage of the joint resolution, the committee of which the Senator has the honor to be the chairman expects soon to report to Congress the bill, or a similar bill, providing for the limitation of the issue of stocks and bonds by interstate carriers?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not state what the committee expects to do. I am, however, willing at any time to bring before that committee any measure that is presented in the Congress of the United States by any Senator, and to bring it up on the request of a Senator for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is chairman of the committee; he has the same authority and influence with the committee that chairmen generally have; and he is perhaps often authorized to speak by those in control of his party on matters that are the subject of party consideration; and so I should like to ask him whether he intends to press such a measure. Is it the intention of the Senator, so far as he can control his committee, to bring out a bill here that will regulate the issuance of stocks and bonds by interstate carriers, regardless of the joint resolution which is now pending?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not accept any language which indicates that I have any control over the committee. That committee is composed of gentlemen of intelligence and independence, and the committee acts according to its own judgment, not according to mine. If, however, the Senator asks me as to my personal views, I shall be very candid with him and will give them.

I believe that as to all the measures which relate to securities, which relate to the reorganization of the commission, and to other important amendments of the interstate-commerce act, it would be wise to turn over their consideration to a subcommittee proposed to be appointed by this joint resolution, if it passes, and to defer action upon them until we get their report. I believe that in that way we shall get a more perfect scheme of legislation than we shall get by two committees of Congress acting in a detached way upon these very important questions at a time when the country is intent upon political rather than economic questions, and when most important questions relating to finance, revenue, and pending wars are absorbing our attention.

Mr. TOWNSEND and Mr. STONE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, with the nominal purpose of the pending resolution I am in accord. Any real information intended to make the Interstate Commerce Commission more useful, to rid it of unnecessary burdens, to strengthen it in its ability to carry out the purposes for which it was created should be obtained; and while I have little faith in investigations by men with fixed and preconceived ideas on the subjects to be investigated, still I can imagine that the commission or committee proposed, if constituted of men who will recognize and report facts, whether pleasant or otherwise, and who will devote the study and work contemplated by this resolution, can be of service to the Congress in its future considerations of the interstate-commerce law. I am going to support the resolution on that theory. It is proper, however, that the Senate should know the possibilities under the measure and the immediate cause of its appearance here.

I am informed by credible authority that this resolution has the indorsement of the President. He is reported as saying that the interstate-commerce law is breaking down and that the railroads should be untrammeled. He also desires, in the interest of nonpartisan legislation, that the proposed committee shall not report until after election. I think he is not likely to be disappointed in the last particular, for the work to be performed by the committee would more likely require two years to complete it than that it could be completed in eight months.

If the President also desired that no interstate-commerce legislation be enacted until after election, this resolution would furnish an excellent excuse to his followers in Congress to postpone such legislation. Of course, whether action on new matters is had or not will rest with Congress, but, judging the future by the past, I have no doubt of the potency of the President's wish in this regard.

I appreciate the President's desire for nonpartisan legislation. It is novel to this administration. Perhaps he has in mind his preparedness program, which has no hope except by the aid of Republicans. I have known that in Democratic as well as in Republican administrations not all of wisdom or patriotism rests with majorities.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to preface my question with the statement that I fully agree with the Senator from Michigan in his expression as to the desirability of having this work done in a nonpartisan way. I myself believe that all legislation ought to be nonpartisan, and that is what suggested the question. The regulation of stocks and bonds was a plank in the platform of the Democratic Party. I myself approve it and believe in it; but when that party undertook to carry out that part of the platform, all at once, for some unseen cause, the program seemed to have been changed and stopped. Now, I want to ask the Senator if this is not politics, and nothing but politics—if it is not merely to lay a foundation so as to give an excuse when going before the country in the coming campaign for not having complied with the agreement they made with the people in their platform adopted at Baltimore in regard to the issuance of stocks and bonds?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I had hoped to express myself on that subject when I reached the point, although I confess that I had not paid much attention to the Baltimore platform, as I did not suppose that it had any binding force upon Democrats at this time. If it contains any unbroken plank, I do not know which it is.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not believe in the coming national campaign as to whatever part of the Baltimore platform has not been complied with—which will probably be a large share of it—the Democrats will have various excuses as to why it was not complied with, and is not this joint resolution the foundation of an excuse for not having done one of the things promised in the Baltimore platform?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I think that is entirely probable. But the expressed excuse for this resolution is the statement that the interstate-commerce law is breaking down and that there is need for more favorable treatment of the railroads. Now, I agree that the Interstate Commerce Commission is not as strong with the people as it was 18 months ago, but I probably can not agree with the President as to the cause of its lessened strength, and certainly if the railroads are unjustly shackled I want to know it and to assist in breaking those shackles, for an injury to the railroads is an injury to the people.

It is my belief that the Interstate Commerce Commission is not as popular with the people as it was prior to its last decision in the 5 per cent rate-increase case, and when the people lose confidence in the commission its usefulness becomes impaired. I have never complained at increases of rates allowed by the commission when its decisions were based upon the law governing rates, viz. "they shall be just and reasonable," and this has been construed by the courts to mean sufficient to yield a reasonable return to the carrier upon the property actually employed for the public use. The railroads should have a right to such returns, but the makers of that law never expected that it would be construed to guarantee profit under any management however faulty, nor to pay dividends on stock however attenuated with water. In other words, the commission was not created to establish a policy for the control of carriers' finances. The first decision of the commission denying the 5 per cent raise was right under the law and the submitted evidence. The railroads had not attempted to prove the justness and reasonableness of the rates in the proposed schedules. They simply said "we need the money." The second decision, six months later than the first, reversed the former on exactly the same state of facts and without any additional testimony except that the European war had broken out. What a blanket for covering mistakes that war has furnished this administration! Why the war created revenue for the carriers. It did not reduce their net incomes.

Now, I have great faith in the character and purposes of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has always been composed of good and capable men. It is one of the most useful branches of the public service. The final decision in the 5 per cent rate increase case shows that a majority of that commission, however, are very human.

They yielded, I believe, to Executive suggestion. I do not know that the President talked with members of the commission after that first decision, but I do know—if newspaper reports are to be believed—that railroad officials in influential numbers called upon the President and that he was reported as being out of harmony with that decision and as favoring the proposed increase. I do know that the commission reversed itself and thereby lost some of the confidence of the people. The people should understand, however, that the commission has not, to my knowledge, followed that decision as a precedent, although railroad attorneys have invoked it.

The Interstate Commerce Commission was created as a people's tribunal. The railroads were under the law given the right to appeal to the court, but the shipper was allowed no such privilege. The commission was supposed to act for him. It could even proceed in his behalf on its own initiative. Why should he be permitted to ask for a review of his agents' acts? Of course, the commission should not be permitted to do wrong to a carrier, for, I repeat, a wrong to a railroad is a wrong to the patrons of that road and to the State, but it should be exceedingly zealous in safeguarding the rights of the people.

The pendulum seems to have swung to the opposite extreme. A few years ago railroad baiting and illy considered railroad legislation was the business of some men, and now the "public-be-damned" policy seems to be more popular. I am willing that a committee be appointed to investigated the interstate-commerce law, but I want it to report facts to the end that unwise laws may be repealed and new legislation enacted to carry out the purposes of the act of 1906.

I know that the Interstate Commerce Commission is overloaded with work. It has been the dumping ground for all kinds of legislative enactments, which have required much time and which should have been assigned to other agencies.

From the very nature of things it can not personally consider the thousand matters submitted to it. It can not even read the testimony taken by its agents in the hundreds of rate and regulation cases brought before it. I doubt if it is possible for its members, individually, to read the more than 2,000 legal briefs presented to them annually. A great part of this work is done by examiners. Some of these examiners have been forced upon the commission by high political influence. All, or nearly all, are paid insufficient salaries; that is, the salaries in many cases are not sufficient to secure permanently men big enough for the job and many of them are not capable of performing the great work to which they are assigned.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's statement, almost startling, that incompetent men are forced upon the commission through political influence suggests a question to me. I want to ask the Senator whether, in view of that statement, it would not be almost necessary to amend the pending joint resolution by providing that the committee shall investigate as to whether political influence, proceeding from any political party at any time, has been instrumental in pushing onto the commission appointees who in reality have to do work which the law really contemplated the commission should do?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I think the joint resolution is broad enough to cover that, if the committee has a disposition to do it. I think it is a serious matter. I am mentioning these things on the assumption that the commission is breaking down; and I want to find out, if I can, why this is so, if it is so. Some of these examiners are high-grade men, but they seize the first opportunity to accept better positions outside the commission. Their experience with the commission makes them valuable to private and corporate interests, and they very properly accept the more remunerative employment. If this proposed committee shall show the true situation in reference to these and similar matters, it will be worth while.

The commission has not broken down and it will not break down if Congress does not ask it to do things impossible of performance, if it is not loaded down with incompetent political subordinates, and if it is not coerced by Executive influence.

I shall vote for this resolution, because it is reasonably possible that the joint committee created by it may disclose facts which will enable and induce Congress to strengthen the great Interstate Commerce Commission in its efforts to perform its duties in an unprejudiced and fearless manner under the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator know what these law examiners are paid annually?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think one or two get around $5,000, and their salaries range from that figure down.

Mr. SHERMAN. Five thousand dollars is the maximum?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand that is the highest salary that is paid to an examiner, although I am not certain that there may not be exceptional cases.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator think that compensation or a lower one will secure a high type of legal ability?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I have been saying that I did not think the salaries were sufficient, because the work of these examiners is of the very highest importance. It is of almost as much importance, possibly, as that of the commissioners themselves. So this question ought to be investigated, and a report made.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield further to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I understand the duties of these examiners, some of whom I have the good fortune to know personally, let me inquire if their examination of the questions that are referred to them is not reduced to writing and reported back to the commission, and whether in the main the commission does not adopt the report of the examiner as the decision of the commission?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the commission is compelled to do that. It can not read these cases. It is an absolute impossibility for it to do so. It must rely very largely upon the reports of the examiners.

Mr. SHERMAN. These examiners ought to be possessed of excellent ability, ought they not? Because they are the ones who make the original examination, and hear the witnesses, and arrive at conclusions, and report them back.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think so. So, Mr. President, I say that I am in favor of the resolution if some of these matters shall have been investigated impartially and fearlessly, with an idea, not of bolstering up some particular theory, but of strengthening the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is the people's forum. It was created as a people's forum.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator if he favors the enactment by Congress of a law giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to regulate the issue of stocks and bonds by interstate railroads?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not sure whether I do or not. I have been in favor of that proposition. I am not entirely clear about it now. Possibly if I could frame the law I might be in favor of it; but knowing, as I do know, that a result might occur that would be detrimental rather than beneficial, without doing any good to anybody, I should hesitate to say as a general proposition that I am in favor of a law to that effect.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, I should like to ask the Senator whether he is in favor of any legislation, such as has been repeatedly suggested by the Interstate Commerce Commission, that would regulate some of the admitted evils? I will put it broadly, and ask the Senator whether there is any legislation in regard to the regulation of railroads that he now favors?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That I now favor?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that the Senator would like to see enacted into law.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is possible that some durable legislation facilitating railroad financing may be necessary. I would prefer that Congress enact it rather than to permit the commission to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator believe that this very resolution that we are going to adopt will be used as a buffer to prevent the enactment of that legislation, and that the cry will always go up, "You must wait two or three years more until this joint committee reports"?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I said at the beginning of my remarks that that was possible under this resolution. If the President—and I say "President" because he has been very potent in matters of legislation—should desire that no legislation be considered, either before the election or afterwards during his term, I think his desire would have a good chance of being carried out; for while Congress has the power to consider and pass legislation regardless of this resolution, yet the probabilities are that if any effective legislation, at least, is offered, this resolotion will be presented as a buffer—to use the Senator's term—to prevent its consideration. I think it is possible.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan further yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator favor us with his opinion as to the cause of over 40,000 miles of railways in the United States being operated by receivers at the present time?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I do not believe I will go into that, Mr. President, because, really——

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it an absence of legislation or too much?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not think it is due to the absence of any law that makes the robbery of the stockholders of a railroad company, such as happened in the case of the New Haven, the Rock Island, and the Frisco, a crime? Is it not because the law at present permits those who ought to represent the stockholders to take advantage of their position of trust to sell them out, as was done in every one of those instances?

In other words, does not the Senator believe that because the ordinary investor knows that the stock of any railroad may be manipulated in that way, and therefore made unsafe, he refuses to invest in it, and that makes of it, as a matter of fact, to a great extent a gambling institution? Ought not a law to be passed that would prevent the kind of a situation that has been illustrated by the roads I have mentioned, and would not that place the stock of all railroads upon a basis that would invite the honest investor?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Answering the last question first, I do not know whether it would or not. If such a law can be passed, and if such a condition is due to the lack of law in that respect, of course, I would be in favor of passing it; but I do not know always just exactly what causes that condition. I know that seemingly excellent laws are passed sometimes, but bad conditions still exist; and I am quite inclined to agree with the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] that as a general proposition we have too much law.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I just wanted to cite one more instance, in addition to the cases mentioned by the Senator from Nebraska, where it seemed to me that the unregulated capitalization of a railroad company may bring about a receivership, and that is the case of the Union Pacific Railroad. It has been described on this floor a number of times, and I will only mention it in outline again.

The result of the transaction was that the Union Pacific Railroad is incumbered with $100,000,000 of indebtedness with no corresponding property in return. The earning capacity of the railroad was not increased by incurring the $100,000,000 of indebtedness. It is perfectly obvious that in a situation of that kind it is more difficult for the railroad company to meet its obligations. If it goes in debt without any return it is very likely, even in normal times, the condition described by the Senator from Illinois may result.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have said all I care to say on this subject, and conclude practically as I began with the statement that I am in favor of any commission that will honestly investigate and get at the facts upon which Congress can proceed to strengthen the great Interstate Commerce Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the first amendment of the committee to the joint resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is this on the committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. BORAH. I do not care to be heard on that.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no special objection to this particular amendment, but I desire to be heard at some length on the joint resolution itself. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I shall not be able to conclude what I have to say at 2 o'clock, and I was not ready to go on to-day. That was the reason why I asked the Senator in the beginning not to make his motion to take up this joint resolution to-day. If it is necessary, however, I presume I can take up the time until 2 o'clock. I do not care to do that. I am perfectly willing to vote on this amendment if the Senator would be willing then that the matter should go over until I can look up a few things that I am not ready to take up at the present time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am afraid I will not have another opportunity of bringing up this matter.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator must realize that 2 o'clock will soon be here. He will have just as much time to-morrow as he had to-day.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am inclined to think the Philippine bill will be temporarily laid aside to enable us to complete the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. That will take unanimous consent, will it not?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think it will. I think it can be done on motion.

Mr. NORRIS. We will see, when we reach it, what it will take. Of course I can take up—as I will have to take up, if the Senator insists on it, and no one else wants to talk—about three times as much time as I would necessarily take if I had a few hours to arrange what I have to say. Since, however, the Senator does not feel inclined to grant me that reasonable request I will proceed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Might not we dispose of these amendments, if the Senator has no objection?

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection. If the Senator was willing, I was willing to concede that much to dispose of these amendments and let the resolution progress that far; but he is not willing, when they are disposed of, to lay the joint resolution over until to-morrow.

Mr. BORAH. It will take five minutes to dispose of the amendments, and we will be that far along to-morrow.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but I do not feel disposed to yield now, unless the Senator would be willing that the joint resolution should go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CATRON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Nelson	Sterling
Bankhead	Hardwick	Newlands	Stone
Beckham	Hitchcock	Norris	Sutherland
Borah	Hollis	Oliver	Swanson
Brandegee	Hughes	Overman	Thomas
Bryan	Husting	Page	Tillman
Catron	James	Phelan	Townsend
Chamberlain	Jones	Pittman	Underwood
Chilton	Kenyon	Poindexter	Vardaman
Clapp	Kern	Reed	Wadsworth
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Shafroth	Walsh
Clarke, Ark.	Lea, Tenn.	Sheppard	Weeks
Colt	Lippitt	Sherman	Williams
Dillingham	McLean	Shields	Works
du Pont	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Gallinger	Myers	Smoot

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. STONE. I wish to announce, and let it stand for the day, the absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on account of illness.

Mr. CHILTON. I make the same announcement that I made on the former roll call as to my colleague [Mr. GOFF] being absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 381.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] whether he has any objection to the Philippine government bill being temporarily laid aside in order that we may complete the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada how long it would probably take to finish the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have heard of but two Senators who desire to speak, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NEWLANDS. With pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator that it will not, in my judgment, take near as much time if the resolution should go over for a day or two as it would take if proceeded with now. I have not looked at some records that I want to examine. I have no desire to delay the resolution, I want to say to the Senator, although I want to be heard somewhat at length. If I have to go on to-day I shall have to stumble through a great deal of stuff that I would probably eliminate if I had a little time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will also say to the Senator from Nevada that I desire to speak a short time on the resolution, and if he should undertake to force it through this afternoon I promise him it will not pass to-day.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand that it requires unanimous consent to lay the Philippine government bill aside. Can it be done on motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be done by motion, of course, but it displaces the Philippine government bill in case the motion is sustained by the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course I would not want to bring about that effect. So I assume the resolution will have to go over. I will ask the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] whether he will be prepared to go on at the close of the morning business to-morrow?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so, as far as I know, unless investigations I intend to make should go further than I expect. I have no disposition to put it over.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that I have had no disposition to cut him off from a full opportunity to debate the resolution, but I have made several attempts to bring it up. The other day I postponed its consideration upon the request of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and upon his assurance that he would help secure the early disposition of the resolution. I should like the Senator from Nebraska to unite with me in bringing the matter to an early conclusion.

Mr. NORRIS. I will not try to delay it for the purpose of delay. I have tried to delay it to-day because I was not ready to go on and would not do so unless I was forced to proceed. I want a little time to get some of the records together that I wish to use.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I give notice, then, that to-morrow morning at the close of the routine morning business I shall call up the resolution for action.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, inasmuch as we have just had a call for a quorum, I am going to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill and all pending amendments may be passed to a final vote not later than 3 o'clock on Thursday of this week.

Mr. SMOOT. I think under the rule that request could not be complied with now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that under the rule it will be necessary to have a call of the roll before the request for unanimous consent can be put. There has been intervening business between the former roll call of the Senate and the present time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, for information, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah whether there would be any objection to such a request?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] is out of the Chamber just at this moment. I think he is at lunch. I do not believe the question ought to be asked in his absence, even in the way the Senator has put it. I could not say, as far as I am concerned, whether there is any objection to setting a day certain for a vote or not.

Mr. LIPPITT entered the Chamber.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Rhode Island has entered the Chamber. I will state to him that I am making an informal inquiry whether there would be objection to fixing an hour on a day for a final vote on the bill and all pending amendments.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, until the pending amendment, what is known as the Clarke amendment, is disposed of I think it would not be easy to get a unanimous-consent agreement fixing a day for voting on the bill. It seems to me that no one knows to just how much discussion that amendment is going to lead. I know several Senators who are inclined to express an opinion in regard to it. So I think it would not be a favorable time to make the request, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska. I personally have no disposition at all to delay a vote on the bill.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate very briefly in opposition to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

The Filipino people are now engaged, with our help, in solving the problem of popular government, and if we grant them independence in the near future it is manifest that they will undertake to establish a system of popular government in some form; in other words, a government by the people and without the aid of a monarch or an aristocracy.

Now, it is clear from the experience of every nation which has tried to establish a stable popular government that we are not giving the Filipino people sufficient time in two or four years to work out this problem.

Can we expect the Filipino people to accomplish something which France was unable to accomplish, which Spain was unable to accomplish, which the Central and South American Republics were unable to accomplish, and which no nation in the world which has made the attempt has been able to accomplish?

It took France 80 years, from 1790 to 1870, to establish a stable popular government, and before she was successful her Government was three times overturned by the populace of Paris, three times by the army, three times by foreign invaders, while one constitution succeeded another in rapid succession. Can we expect more of the Filipino people than of the French people?

The efforts of Spain to establish popular government began in 1812, and after some 40 military insurrections it has ended in a restoration of monarchy; and the experience of France and Spain has been the experience of other European nations in their attempts to establish popular government during the past century, with the possible exception of Switzerland.

Turning to the Western Hemisphere, we are all familiar with the history of the Central and South American Republics and the length of time it took them to establish a stable popular government. It is safe to say that it was 50 years from the times these colonies of Spain declared their independence before they succeeded in this undertaking.

Not to mention minor insurrections, there were more than 80 revolutions in these Republics during the first half century of their existence. Mr. Meyer, of the Library of Congress, has given me some data on this subject, which I ask to be made a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Data in relation to revolutions in South American and Central American States and in Mexico.

[1] Practical dictatorship.

Mr. COLT. From this compilation it appears that there were 13 revolutions in Chile during the first 50 years of her independence, 7 in Argentina, 7 in Bolivia, 6 in Peru, 5 in Colombia, and 10 in Mexico. The number of revolutions in the other Republics will be found in the annexed paper.

And it may be observed in this connection that it took us, with all our experience in self-government, some 13 years, or from 1776 to 1789, before we succeeded in establishing a stable, popular government.

When we consider the history of popular government and the present conditions in the Philippines, I am convinced that it is impossible for the Filipino people to establish a stable popular government in two or four years, and hence that it would be an act of injustice toward them and a breach of good faith on the part of the United States to grant them independence at the time proposed in this amendment.

As to the second proposition contained in this amendment, I am unable to see how the United States can, during the present war, obtain any pledge from other nations guaranteeing the sovereignty and independence of the Philippines; and, if the times were normal, I can find no sufficient ground upon which the great powers would enter into any such obligation. If this should turn out to be true, and the United States alone should guarantee the independence of the Philippines for five years after parting with our sovereignty, then we are left in the position of assuming a responsibility without the power of enforcing it. For these reasons, Mr. President, I shall vote against this amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not share the views of able Senators who have spoken upon this question with reference to the attitude of Japan toward this Government or of the attitude of Japan with reference to our possession of the Philippines. I do not believe that the Japanese people are seeking difficulty with the United States, and I have never seen anything which indicated to me that our possession of the Philippines was at all irritating to those people or to the Japanese Government. In any event, any vote that I shall cast upon this amendment or the bill will in no wise be colored or controlled by what is supposed to be the attitude of Japan or any other nation toward the United States. I look upon it as a matter which concerns the United States alone and its policy. What is our interest and what is our duty toward the Philippine people? When I shall have determined to my satisfaction these questions I shall not be concerned about the supposed views or supposed irritableness of other nations.

Neither do I believe, I desire to say by way of digression, that there is any great power seeking difficulty or anticipating trouble with the United States. Our troubles at the present time with other nations arise not out of any specific desire on the part of those nations to have difficulty with the United States but simply because their great interests and our interests inevitably under the conditions which are now prevailing conflict. It is quite natural for those powers, struggling as they are for existence, to urge their rights and to pursue their policies to the limit, and it is quite proper that the United States should guard its own interests. But whatever the difficulties are or may have been, it has never occurred to me that we ought to interpret the situation as we find it now throughout the world, and the difficulties which now present themselves to us as a desire upon the part of any nation to have difficulty with the United States. I do not believe that any of the belligerent nations are pursuing a course with a view of bringing about unfriendly relations. It has been assumed that because of Japan's favor to the allies in this war that the allies would be bound to join in any ambitious program which Japan might have at the close of the war, and that therein is to be found a menace to the United States.

Nations do not act upon the moral obligations of yesterday but upon the primary interests of to-day. They do not consider in making up their policies the friendships and relations of the past, but the advantages and opportunities of the present or the future. It seems in these days that even treaty obligations are of slight or no consequence as against present exigencies or future expectations. The alliances of this supreme tragedy may last a little longer than usual by reason of the fearful welding, but even they will yield to the changing interest and lurking jealousies of the swift coming years. Only a short time ago Japan and Russia were at war, and we see them now in practical alliance. We see Germany and England within most recent years in the friendliest relationship. We see them now in deadly conflict. I do not get much enlightenment or imbibe any considerable fear from the present alliances. If you will tell me where the vital and material interest of this or that nation will lie a decade from now, I will tell you something of the dangers of attack from that source. But if you undertake to talk to me of the present alliances and friendships and from these to deduce future programs and actions I am unable to become very deeply interested or greatly alarmed. We do not know what the future interests will be, and therefore we do not know what the future alliances will be. All the more reason why we should be constantly prepared. The patriotism of a people is a noble but a singular virtue. It ignores the appeal of past friendships and soon forgets the insults of former enemies.

So, Mr. President, any condition which may be presented at this time as to the supposed attitude or state of mind of any great power would have nothing to do with any vote which I might cast upon this bill.

In saying that I do not believe that Japan is seeking trouble with this country or that either the central powers or the allies are formulating plans or nursing designs looking to an immediate attack upon the United States dependent only on the result of the war, I do not, of course, argue against a reasonable program of preparedness. I would assist, however, if I could, in raising the discussion of so vital a problem out of the region of temporary fear, based upon conditions which may pass with the hour, into the region of deliberate conviction based upon those sound and permanent principles which must accompany national power so long as it endures. Under the leadership of Col. Roosevelt, eight or nine years ago, I voted for four battleships to be at once constructed, and to be followed by a policy which would have given in this hour not a third-rate but in any event a second-rate Navy. I voted then as I did because I could not well understand how a great Nation with thousands of miles of seacoast and a stupendous wealth at the water's edge, with its commerce extending to and ramifying all parts of the earth and entering upon its career of world power, could safely be without a great Navy. It seemed to me to be as indispensable to our national honor and prestige as any other great principle upon which the Republic is founded; that in the vicissitudes of human affairs there may come a time, and no man knoweth in advance the time, when force, and nothing but force, would mean safety, mean civilization, mean national integrity, mean national honor.

Washington, in his inaugural address, said:

> There is a rank due to the United States among nations which will be imperiled, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation of weakness. If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war.

That is the principle, permanent and abiding, as essential before the war as now, upon which to build your program of preparedness. Not upon the theory of some supposed specific plan of attack, more likely false than true, but upon the principle and the same principle that you police your cities—simply because so long as men are human disorders will sometimes arise, and so long as nationalism is the basis upon which human societies are organized conflicts will sometimes come. I have no faith in the permanency or effectiveness of any program of preparedness superinduced by or based upon present disturbances or conflicts. A policy begun in fear will end in failure. When the supposed causes seem to pass interest in the program will pass. Your arguments will no longer be backed up by concrete examples and your appropriations will cease. But a program, sir, based upon the broad and serene policy of Washington, as clear visioned and as long visioned as that of his doctrine of neutrality, and sustained by every truly great American from that hour to this, a program based upon education and intelligent conviction of the effect that it is indispensable to national safety and power at all times, will have some chance of being permanent and effective.

Take a lesson from recent history and see how futile are the plans and programs founded on passing incidents and how essential it is that we dig deeper and build, as Washington and Hamilton built, upon the verities of human nature and human experience as they are gathered not of a day but through the long sweep of the years. The spring of 1914 was the richest in promise of peace in the whole history of the world. The fringe of the millenium seemed to be lingering about the horizon everywhere. Another peace conference was soon to be held at The Hague. We were just getting ready to celebrate the centenary of the treaty of Ghent. Everybody was writing treaties. The Senate was ratifying them without discussion or consideration, provided they looked like peace treaties. Rulers were signing them with ostentatious ceremony.

The sleeping qualities of the human heart seemed really to be aroused and prepared to dominate all human conduct and all nations and all peoples, all races and all religions were soon to be united in a bond of universal peace, unending and unbreakable, and human misunderstandings, selfishness, and passion and war were to be known no more. One of the great peace advocates of the world declared in exultation that the world would never again witness a great war. But, sir, in August came the world conflict. The delegates to The Hague were interrupted in their journey by the submarines and the Zeppelins. Beneath the surface so calm and pacific were the old, ugly passions and prejudices and ambitions of men. Not only was the millenium postponed, but it is a serious question if civilization has not gone back many a decade. I would have no hopes, Mr. President, of any reasonable, permanent, and helpful program of preparedness if we are to continue to make this supposed enmity the moving power of the program. This great conflict has served to awaken and to startle, but it has not changed the principles upon which a nation should always build its program of preparedness.

I have digressed, Mr. President, from the discussion of the Philippine question to say this much upon this subject, because so much has been said and has been well said, so far as that is concerned, as to the supposition that our dealing with the Philippines and, indeed, our entire program of preparedness should be based rather upon conditions as they now present themselves than upon those great principles which, in my judgment, obtain just as much in peace as in war.

Mr. President, I want now to discuss for a time the Philippine question. It seems to me that there are two propositions, or two courses, or two policies, open to us in dealing with the Philippines. The first is to get out of the Philippines now, or as soon as we may, taking into consideration the necessity of certain delay necessary to the transfer of government. There is no doubt, I think, that this policy would be to the best interest of the United States if we were to view the matter wholly as a question of material interest or material welfare. I think that most of us, if we could roll back and reconstruct or redirect the events of the last quarter of a century, would leave the Philippine Islands just as we found them. I think most of us feel that it would have been better. But circumstances unusual prevailed which seemed to necessitate assuming the sovereignty over those islands. If we were now clear of the islands, our sovereignty withdrawn, so far as the people of the United States are concerned as to their material interests, it would be considered as altogether to our advantage. Any proposition to withdraw sovereignty within a reasonable time—that is, as soon as the transfer of the reins of government and the adjustment of American interests can be effected—has for its support the material interests of the people of the United States. I am bound to say, however, that if the Filipino people would be content to remain indefinitely and the people of the United States would eliminate all politics and settle down to the task of training them for a higher civilization, that immediate withdrawal would not be for the best interest of the Filipino people themselves. It is the "if," however, which seems insurmountable.

The second proposition, Mr. President, is that of remaining in the Philippines until we shall have done something substantial and permanent in the way of instructing the Filipinos in self-government—in self-government as we understand it, because we have no capacity for teaching self-government upon any other plan. When we talk of teaching self-government in the Philippines it must necessarily be to some extent in harmony with the views of self-government as we entertain those views; in other words, if we stay there any longer than the necessary time to get out, it must be that we are staying there for the benefit of the Filipino people themselves—that we are not staying there for the benefit of the United States or for any material interest which the United States could have.

If we remain in the Philippines for the purpose of performing this obligation—that is, of teaching the Filipino people free government and the capacity to maintain independence—a practical question arises, namely, how long will it take us to perform that task? How long will it take to reconstruct the conception of government which is entertained by those people, if indeed any idea of government is entertained by them at all? After we determine, if we can, how long it will take, then is there anyone willing to declare that we are to remain there until the task is completed? If we do not stay until such time as we shall have accomplished the task in its fullness, will we have benefited them at all? In other words, can we accomplish anything there in the next 10 years or 15 years or 20 years or 25 or 30 or 35 or 40 years in the way of permanent value of permanent good to the Filipino people? I believe that if we were to leave the Filipino people within the next 2 or 3 or 4 years, they would be benefited by our presence there just as much as if we should stay there for 15 or 20 years, and then leave them. I say this for the reason that no people in the history of the world have ever acquired anything like a capacity for self-government within less than centuries. It has never been possible under any conditions for a people to acquire that great power except through centuries of struggle and sacrifice, even when they have had the guiding hand and controlling influence of higher and more civilized nations to lead them.

I think, therefore, the question presents itself in this way: Are we going to remain there until we fulfill the obligation in its entirety upon the basis of teaching those people the capacity for self-government? If so, how long will it take? As has been said by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], it will not only take decades, but it will take decades upon decades to accomplish that. In other words, in so far as we can now foresee or formulate plans, it means the permanent holding of the Philippine Islands.

The Anglo-Saxon race was from 500 to 1,000 years in acquiring a capacity for self-government. France has been not only decades but centuries in working out the problem of self-government. For more than a hundred years the Mexican people have been struggling with the question of self-government, and, in my judgment, they are no nearer to it to-day than they were at the time that Hidalgo raised the insurrection of about 1810 and based his fight upon the principle of a true democracy.

The veneer of democracy is one thing and easily created. But real democracy, government by the people, is a wholly different thing and the most difficult of all governments to construct and maintain. The outward form of republicanism or democracy signifies nothing. It may conceal the most cruel, corrupt, and oppressive absolutism, as is instanced in the history of Mexico for the last 30 years. The most difficult lesson for a people to learn and the most elusive and difficult to retain after it has been learned is the lesson of self-government. The most tormenting problem ever given to a people for demonstration is the problem of democracy. It has its manifest blessings when wrought out to success, every one of which blessings, however, are purchased and enjoyed only through the most exacting devotion and the most inflexible public interest upon the part of an entire people. There can be no basic foundation for such a government other than the most widespread and thoroughly disseminated knowledge and character upon the part of the people. No people have ever acquired the capacity for self-government except through decades and centuries of the most grievous experience. Why talk to these people of independence now? They have not, as a people, the slightest conception of the duties, the sacrifices, and the obligations of free government. They have not as yet mastered the first lesson. To delude them into the belief that they are fit for self-government or that they soon will be is to work signal injustice to them.

If you point to the fact that there are brilliant and capable men in the Philippines, I concede it all. I in nowise seek to impeach their character or intellectual standing. But there is no country in the civilized or semicivilized world which may not produce a few men of great and brilliant attainments, men who may in their aspirations have some poetical conceptions of free government. Mexico had her Hidalgo, her Guerrero, her Juarez, her Madero. They built their castles in the upper air and gave the highest and noblest manifestations of their sincerity, for they died and were willing to die for their faith. But they had no foundation upon which to build. That without which free institutions are but a tormenting dream, to wit, a sturdy, self-reliant people, a people of intelligence, of fixed and wholesome habits and customs they did not have. The only thing in the world out of which you can build and the only thing which will for any length of time preserve a Republic is the character and wholesomeness and principles of the people, the masses. Sam Adams was successful in organizing his revolt and sustaining it because he appealed to men of unusual character, of exceptional training, of signal moral courage; men who had been educated in what was in some respects the most remarkable university the world has ever seen, the New England town meeting. Washington, in the convention of 1787, said in those famous lines that perhaps no government which they could form would be accepted by the people. But it was accepted. The people were equal to the task imposed upon them. What could those leaders have done without such a constituency?

If we stay there, therefore, to serve these people, what standard shall we set up? What must we do and what must they be willing for us to do?

When shall we expect the United States Government to announce that in its judgment these people should now be free and independent? Will it be when a few intelligent and capable men have developed sufficient capacity to maintain an aristocratic form of government or will it be when the masses have been educated and schooled into self-discipline and into that knowledge of public affairs and that sustained interest in the public welfare which makes possible a republic? Will we, in order to escape the burdens of our task like an impatient guardian anxious to be rid of the ward, be satisfied with a republic in form or in name but an aristocracy in fact—a government with a few cultured and ambitious men at the top and ignorance and dependence and peonage and slavery at the bottom—or will it be when there has been sown among the people that spirit of independence, that integrity of view, that vision which alone fits them for the onerous obligations of free government? The latter obligation is the one which this country must assume if it take up the task at all. To do less is to shirk responsibility, and we had better go now. To remain longer are expense and outlay for us and no permanent benefit to the Filipinos.

You can not take those people, with the training which they have had, or the lack of training, and rear the masses of the people themselves to the standard of self-government inside of half a century or a century. If we are to discuss the question of self-government within 17 years after we first went there, and promise those people independence, or hold that view up before them at a time when they have no conception of self-government, to my way of thinking it is infinitely better to turn them loose now, and let them work out their own destiny. We may spend our time and our means and our energy for the next 15 or 20 years, and, so far as permanent results are concerned, they will be no different than if we should leave the Philippines within the next 3 or 4 years.

So I say, Mr. President, we either ought to adopt the amendment which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has submitted or we ought to eliminate, once and for all, all discussion of independence and let the Filipino people understand that the first lesson which they must learn is the lesson of self-government before they shall be permitted to assume the right of independence, and they must be permitted to know from us in plain but kindly language that they will not acquire that capacity for self-government within the next 50 or 100 years; that it is a long, tedious lesson, requiring patience and persistence beyond anything they seem to have contemplated.

Mr. President, there is one other feature of this matter we can not ignore in measuring the task before us. The power of a nationality struggling ever to become a nation is one of the most weird and persistent influences in all the affairs of the human family. The turmoil in Europe for the last 100 years has been largely by reason of the fact that some nationality has been dominated or controlled by a nation of a different nationality. A nationality and a nation are two different propositions. These people are entirely different in language, in customs, in habits, in tastes, in mental capacity. They are a nationality in and of themselves, so far as comparison with the United States is concerned, and it will take many years to reconstruct that nationality, if we can ever do it at all. I think I may say that it has never been accomplished satisfactorily and never tried for any considerable length of time without great sacrifice of human life.

In 1772 three of the great powers of Europe partitioned Poland; in 1793 they made that partition complete, and were supposed to have destroyed that great nationality; but, as some writer has said, the Polish agitator has been the nerve of revolution in Europe every hour since the partition took place. There has never been a great revolution struggling for better conditions in Europe since 1772 that has not in some respects been led or aided by great Polish patriots. The kings or the absolute powers which distributed their country distributed the patriotism and the desire for nationality throughout Europe and furnished the means by which to augment, and thereby further, every revolution in Europe since that time.

It seems impossible, Mr. President, to destroy that sentiment of nationality which at all times inheres in a people, and it seems to be as strong with races of inferior capacity, if I may use the term, as with races of a more developed standard.

I want to read a few lines, Mr. President, from the great Italian statesman, Mazzini, in regard to the proposition of one nation trying to dominate, control, or educate, or direct another nation or nationality. Speaking of the smaller nationalities of Europe which have been under the control of some larger nation, Mr. Mazzini said:

> They struggled, they still struggle, for country and liberty: for a word inscribed upon a banner, proclaiming to the world that they also live, think, love, and labor for the benefit of all. They speak the same language, they bear about them the impress of consanguinity, they kneel beside the same tombs, they glory in the same tradition, and they demand to associate freely, without obstacles, without foreign domination in order to elaborate and express their idea, to contribute their stone also to the great pyramid of history. It is something moral which they are seeking, and this moral something is in fact, even politically speaking, the most important question in the present state of things. It is the organization of the European task. In principle, nationality ought to be to humanity that which division of labor is in a workshop—the recognized symbol of association; the assertion of the individuality of a human group called by its geographical position, its traditions, and its language to fulfill a special function in the European work of civilization.

Whether that function be small or great, inferior or superior, it seems to assert its right to existence against all the power of man to change or to redirect it; in other words, a review of the history of the world shows that there is a logic of things and a logic of events which no human agency can change or redirect, and one of them is founded upon the great desire of every nationality at some time to become a nation.

Now, Mr. President, let us examine for a moment the conception of government which obtains in the Philippines after the years which we have been there—and perhaps we have done as good a work in the Philippines as ever was accomplished by any people toward a dependent people. I read from the testimony of ex-President Taft, on page 368, at the bottom of the page. He is there discussing the presentation of the views of leading Filipinos upon the question of independence:

> Well, they said, they wanted to file a brief with me; and they did so—and these were leading educated Filipinos. In that brief they went on to enumerate the number of offices that there were in the municipalities and the Provinces and the central government; and then they gave statistics of the Ilustrados, the educated people in the island; and they proved that the Ilustrados were more than twice as many as the offices to be filled; and they said that with two shifts that would give a competent government, and self-government. [Laughter.] Well, I explained to them that it was not the capacity to fill offices that gave a capacity for self-government to a people, it was public opinion, and that if they did not have broad popular public opinion to control people in office, they were not fit for self-government.

Then he further says:

> I took a committee of Senators and Representatives out to the Philippines when I was Secretary of War, in 1905, and Fisk Warren, an anti-imperialist from Boston, visited the islands at the same time, because he thought that with my prejudice and my bitterness of feeling I could not be relied on to show the party the real capacity of the Filipino people for government; and so he demanded, in the name of the Filipino people, that I give the Filipino people an opportunity to be heard.
>
> And after I had taken the party all around the islands and we came back to Manila I sent word to Mr. Warren that he might produce any committee that the Filipinos wished to send and present what they thought as to their own power of self-government.
>
> And so they presented a petition August 28, 1905. I can not read it all. It says.

This, to me, Mr. President, is one of the most interesting features of this entire investigation and altogether the most instructive piece of evidence that we have. This is from their brief:

> In spite of the unquestionable political capacity of the Filipino people, the result of their present degree of culture and civilization, that they are in a condition of self-government is denied in varying degrees and forms, though precisely the contrary is demonstrated by facts, experience, and considerations, among which the following deserve mention:

First. It is an irrefutable fact that the Filipino people are governable; the period of Spanish dominion and of the present American sovereignty bear out this assertion. The political condition of a country principally depends upon the degree of governableness of its people; the more governable the popular classes are the better the political condition of the country.

This was the view of government as presented by the most intelligent of the Filipino people, which, of course, is the old view of the Holy Alliance, which was formed at the close of the Napoleonic wars, the principal tenet of whose creed was that all power came from above and that the people were not entitled to have anything to say with reference to the divine right of government; that a governable people were a people who submitted to the dictation and direction of those who chanced to be in a governing position. It is the old doctrine of the congress of Laybach, that the power to govern comes from above, and that all effort to assert any such right upon the part of the masses should be eliminated, regardless of the method of elimination.

When a people such as the Filipinos gave signal evidence of their capacity to obey during a period of over 300 years, free from disturbance or deep political commotions, it must be granted, considering that all things tend to progress, that they possess the art of government; all the more so because, among other powers, they possess that of assimilation in a marked degree, an assimilativeness which distinguishes them from other people of the Far East.

Second. If the masses of the people are governable, a part must necessarily be denominated the directing class, for as in the march of progress, moral or material, nations do not advance at the same rate, some going forward while others fall behind, so it is with the inhabitants of a country, as observation will prove.

Third. If the Philippine Archipelago has a popular governable mass called upon to obey and a directing class charged with the duty of governing, it is in a condition to govern itself.

These factors, not counting incidental ones, are the only two by which to determine the political capacity of a country.

To wit, a governing class and a class willing to be governed—class domination, class control, class direction—and no form of government ever conceived by the human mind is quite so cruel and oppressive as class government.

These factors, not counting incidental ones, are the only two by which to determine the political capacity of a country—an entity that knows how to govern, the directing class, and an entity that knows how to obey, the popular masses.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator inform me whose sentiments are those?

Mr. BORAH. Those were the sentiments of some 25 of the most highly educated Filipinos as they presented their theory of self-government to ex-President Taft.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator state the date of that document?

Mr. BORAH. Nineteen hundred and five.

Mr. LIPPITT. Some 10 or 11 years ago?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I presume the Senator makes that suggestion upon the theory that such an idea of government could be eliminated in a period of some 10 or 20 years.

Mr. LIPPITT. No, Mr. President; I only wanted to have the exact time, because it was only a few years after we had been in the islands, and I thought it was perhaps only just to the Filipino people that that might be stated and let everybody draw his own inference from it.

Mr. BORAH. What I am seeking to do in bringing the attention of the Senate to this conception of self-government is to emphasize the fact that it comes from a class of people who are more highly educated and better trained in the affairs of government than we would be able to educate and train the masses of the Filipinos in the next fifty or a hundred years. It is to show they have a different standard, a different understanding, and that we not only have to train them to read and write and give them poise and character as a people, but we must reform and change all standards and all conceptions of government.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. It is, in other words, Mr. President, a conflict between the old doctrine of the holy alliance and the United States Government in the Philippines, and we will have to stay there, if we do stay, until we uproot and eradicate a thing that is most difficult to uproot and eradicate, and that is the conception of government which has been drilled into the intellect and moral fiber of those people by 300 years of experience. Now I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was about to ask the Senator if he did not think that the sentiments expressed by the people whom he has just quoted are sentiments of the class that would do the ruling and governing in the islands if the Filipino people had their independence?

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; I have no doubt of that.

Mr. President, I know that there are a great many very intelligent men in the Philippines, men of great capacity—exceptionally brilliant men some of them are—and in saying anything that I do say I do not, as I have already said, seek to impeach their intelligence or the integrity of character of those men, but we are not dealing with a situation which simply requires us to teach some one how to read or how to speak the English language; we are dealing with a question which requires the unteaching of centuries of schooling. We can not, if I may repeat, ignore the tutelage or the gloomy lessons in government which those people have had for the last 300 years.

The country, as I have said, which held sway over these islands, it will be remembered, was one of those powers which joined the conspiracy at the close of the Napoleonic wars, under the sacrilegious title of the Holy Alliance, the supreme purpose of which was to crush out free government and to root out the spirit of liberty wherever it was possible to exert to that end its sinister and baleful influence. The basic principle of this merciless creed was that the people were by ordinance divine wholly unfit to have a voice in the sacred affairs of government; that all powers of government came from above; and that any manifestation of independence, any expressed purpose to be free upon the part of the governed, were to be stamped out in any conceivable way which a tireless and satanic ingenuity could devise. No member of this conspiracy was more unyielding, more successful in carrying out in all its hideous logic this cruel and fiendish theory. Wherever her inflexible decrees have had sway ignorance and oppression and social degradation have been the immutable lot of the masses. With studied and iniquitous vigilance, with an industry worthy of a noble cause, she punished with rack and thumbscrew, with torture and death, everyone who gave evidence of a longing to enjoy the initiative of sentient beings. Always exacting the last penny which an oppressed peasantry could through unremitting toil grind out, withholding every comfort whose temporary enjoyment might be calculated to reanimate some soul with the desire to be free, she succeeded at last in destroying wholly and completely the initiative, the self-respect, the self-reliance, the hopes, and ambitions of all those from whom we believe the rights of government are derived. She left the hearts and souls of the people as bare and blighted as the miserable hovels in which they lived. It is no ordinary task to unteach these lessons, to reanimate with the aspirations and confidence of a self-helping people these dependents of three long, black, rayless centuries.

It will be a difficult task, a long and arduous task, to implant in the hearts and minds of the masses that initiative, that intelligence, that self-respect and self-reliance indispensable to a self-governing people.

So, Mr. President, we must gird ourselves for this kind of a task: Either to stay there indefinitely—and I say "indefinitely" because I regard 50 or 100 years beyond a point which we ought to discuss independence at all; I regard the task before us such as precludes the discussion of independence or anything like it. We must stay there indefinitely if we are going to help the masses of the Filipino people; and I do not permit myself to be influenced by the intelligent, capable upper class in the Philippines, because they will likely be able to take care of themselves. To state it more appropriately perhaps in the task before us we must first of all consider the interests of the masses.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator tell us, if he has the information, what proportion of the entire population of the Philippine Islands are of the more intelligent class?

Mr. BORAH. I can not tell the Senator exactly. I am told, however, by those who have been there that it is a very small percentage, but I do not know what it is exactly.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, there are about 68,000, as I recollect, qualified to vote under the literacy test.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How many?

Mr. LIPPITT. About 68,000.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; there are 248,000 who were registered under the test, and 235,000 actually voted.

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes; and of that 235,000 there were about 68,000, if my recollection is correct, who qualified under the literacy qualification. There were other qualifications. I will turn to the testimony in a minute or two, but I think I am correct.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, in an address delivered by ex-President Taft before the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco, in 1915, he discussed the point the Senator has been making, as to the fact that there was a governing class and a class willing to be governed, and he said:

> Thus they were capable of self-government because they had a ruling class of 10 per cent and an obedient class of 90 per cent.

And he went on further to say that a prominent Filipino suggested that they ought to have a third class of Chinamen, who would not be allowed to participate in government, but who would do the work.

Mr. BORAH. In the language of the ex-President, to serve in the capacity of work animals.

Mr. GALLINGER. Work animals; yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me just a word further, I quite agree with what the Senator has been saying, that in order that a people may be capable of self-government the masses of the people must understand self-government. It is not sufficient to have a governing class.

I desire to put this question to the Senator: According to the information which we now seem to have, probably not to exceed 10 per cent of the people of the Philippine Islands have sufficient training or sufficient intelligence even to undertake the effort of governing themselves. Suppose that instead of these intelligent Filipinos—who, we must all concede, even though they may be intelligent, have not the capacity of the Anglo-Saxon for self-government—10 per cent of the population were American citizens who were trained and who had inherited through centuries this ability for self-government. Even with a class of that character in these islands, does the Senator believe that it would be possible for those men, let alone the Filipinos, to govern the islands if the strength and power of the United States Government were entirely withdrawn?

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President. Even the Anglo-Saxon race has not shown very much greater capacity for proper self-government, where there were only about 10 per cent of them, than any other race. The Anglo-Saxon race has disclosed its great capacity for self-government because of the intelligence and the capacity and the character of the other 90 per cent.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Precisely.

Mr. BORAH. If you had only 10 per cent of Americans in the Philippine Islands, I would not be willing to intrust them with the power of government over the other 90 per cent. The Senator will recall that only this morning in the Judiciary Committee we had an illustration of the remarkable disposition of the Anglo-Saxon race to revert to the power of tyranny and oppression when there were only about 10 per cent of them in the place, and the other 90 per cent were of some other class or of an inferior people. They ignore the Constitution and constitutional provisions, in certain places where we are now governing a large class, almost as much as our cultured friends who have been trained in that kind of class government for the last 300 years.

There is just one safeguard for a free people, and there is no other found among men or upon earth; and that is the education, the character, the intelligence, the initiative, and the poise of the man in the street. There is no class of people who are to be trusted with the power of governing some one else. Abraham Lincoln said that no man is himself free who governs some one else against his will.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a minute, to correct a statement which I made a few minutes ago?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIPPITT. I find, on looking at the record, at page 187, that there were about 90,000 Filipinos who qualified under the educational test. There were others who qualified under the qualification for holding office and under a property qualification.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment, and then I will yield to the Senator. Does the Senator wish to reply to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes. I want to say to the Senator from Rhode Island that he does not take into consideration the fact that the qualification which is imposed on a voter there, outside of the property qualification, consists of his knowing enough to read and write the English language or the Spanish language, neither of which is his own language. Suppose, as a matter of fact, we were to impose here the requirement that no one in this country could vote unless he were able to speak the Spanish or the French language. How many voters would we have?

It seems to me that is not a fair illustration to test how many people can read and write in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I have made no statement with reference to these points. I merely made a statement as to the number of people who were qualified to vote under a property qualification. Any deductions that may be drawn from that are something entirely outside of my vision. I merely stated the fact.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. The statement made by the Senator just before he was interrupted seems to me so apt and so true that I feel impelled to inform him that some years ago I had the honor of an interview with the late President of Mexico, Porfirio Diaz, and in response to an inquiry which he made of me concerning my impressions of the Mexican Government, I replied that it seemed to me to have been better described by Mr. Lummis as "a republic in chancery" than any other description I had ever seen. I then said that the so-called Republic of Mexico was as radically different from our own, so far as my observation went, as though it were a monarchy. His reply was that no nation can be a self-governing one which does not possess a great, intelligent, patriotic, property-holding class, and that until Mexico had such a class its government would not be that of the United States.

I simply interject that into the RECORD because it seems to be so apposite with the reflection of the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is quite correct, and I am coming in a few moments to Mexico as an illustration. In taking up Mexico I will say now, in order that there may be no misgivings, that I am not going to discuss it as its history has been written for the last four or five years, but prior to that time, as an illustration of class rule.

I find here, upon page 370, that ex-President Taft says there are about 90 per cent of the people not fit for self-government, but that the 10 per cent of educated Filipinos do not understand self-government. I ought to say in passing here, in order that there may be no misunderstanding, that there is nothing surprising about the fact that the Filipino educated gentleman has an entirely different conception of government than we have. He has been trained in it. He has known nothing else. He has no other view before him. He never has had. It would be a great surprise if we should find that he had any such view as we entertain.

Let me call your attention to an illustration drawn by the ex-President:

> One day, while I was governor in the Philippines, a man named Felipe Calderon, one of the leading lawyers in the Philippines, the man who introduced the constitution into the convention at Malolos, came to see me—

Now, here is a constitution maker—

> While he was there a poor old Tagalog, who could not speak Spanish, presented a petition to me. My Spanish would make your heart bleed to hear it, even when I was out there, and now it has gone entirely. The petition was in Spanish, and so far as I could figure it out, it contained a recital that his son had been six years in Bilibid Prison; that he had never been tried; and the old man wanted to know what I could do. He had heard that the commission had come there to help out the Filipinos, and he wanted to know if we could not help him.
> Well, I turned to Calderon and said to him, "The writ of habeas corpus is in force here. If you will just present a petition for the writ in any of the courts in Manila you can get this man out, if what he says is true."
>
> "Well," said Calderon, "what is a petition for a writ of habeas corpus"?
> He had copied the Mexican Constitution and the Federal Constitution and had helped to make up the constitution of Malalos, but he did not have any practical knowledge of those processes which are the Anglo-Saxon palladium of individual right and liberty. And so I drafted for him the form of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and he took it into court and he got his man out.

That is called to your attention to direct you again to the thought that the proposition of teaching them to read and write, and of giving them an education, and of spreading that kind of intelligence among the masses is only the first step, a very short step, and may be a very ineffective step, toward self-government.

The task before the American people in the Philippines is to reconstruct the entire conception of government on the part of the intelligent, as well as to train those who are without intelligence; and no more difficult task was ever assumed by anyone. Let me ask the learned Members of this Senate, men versed in history: Will you give me an illustration, from the beginning of time until now, where that task has been achieved with any degree of permanent success? Will you tell me of an instance in which an intelligent and educated or a self-governing people has ever trained another nationality into their style and capacity of government?

It may be that there is such an example; but I do not know of it, and I have been unable to find it. I do know that there are countless illustrations to the contrary. Therefore, I say that the task before us is not the task of a quarter of a century, nor of half a century. Indeed, sir, if we are to be fair and candid with the Filipino, we must say to him that he is with us for all time, unless we turn him loose now. So far as those now living in the Philippines are concerned, they will never secure independence if they await the completion of the full task which we assume by remaining longer.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator; but I should like to suggest to him that in those governments where the people have evolved their own civilization and reached a point where no one would question their capacity for maintaining a government of their own, in order to change to our form of government they have almost universally been forced to resort to revolution, and the revolutions have almost universally come from the class of people who Senators maintain upon this floor are incapable of self-government.

Mr. BORAH. All revolutions in government that had any real foundation have started from the masses.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I entirely agree with what the Senator has said; and I want to cite an instance bearing out the Senator's argument that mere forms of self-government do not constitute self-government; and that, on the contrary, without any forms at all, if the people understand the principles of self-government, they will have it. I refer to the contrast between the man the Senator has described, who drew a free constitution for the Philippine Islands and did not know what the writ of habeas corpus was, and the great, free people of Great Britain, probably as free a people as there are in the world, who have no constitution at all, so far as any written form is concerned.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. President, one more illustration upon this matter and I will pass it over.

It has been said in this debate that there is very little resemblance between the Mexican situation in previous years and that in the Philippines. I find a very strong resemblance.

The Philippines were discovered and brought under control by the same class of explorers as those who overran and conquered Mexico—the same treatment of the natives, the same method of control, the same remorseless rule ensued. I venture to say the same effect and the same deadly virus were the inheritance of both countries from the common master. Allow me to digress here long enough to say I have read a good many pages of history, some bright and some exceptionally black, but I have never read any story of frightfulness anywhere equal to the dismal, monotonous, ruthless, unbroken, and unending story of oppression and injustice in Mexico. In duration and in demoniacal heartlessness, in unvarying fiendishness it has no parallel, so far as I know. Compared with it the cruelties inflicted upon Cuba which called into action the humanitarian spirit of a whole Nation were mild and fleeting. And so far as bringing any relief was concerned, the people of Mexico gained nothing by her independence. It left the same class of rulers—men with the same conception of the rights of the masses, the same venal appetites. It is a pathetic tale, the scene of which lies so close to our door, this effort, this long, futile struggle of the masses to be free, to realize that ever-haunting, half-waking dream of ownership of their lands and their homes; a dream always interrupted at a propitious moment under Empire or Republic alike by that debonair and delivilish clique of conspirators, the sole inheritors of Mexico from the mother country.

It is now over a hundred years since the statesman-priest, Miguel Hidalgo, called about him the oppressed, the peons and the slaves, and declared war on their oppressors. From that hour to this the fight has gone on, and in my humble judgment they are no nearer realizing anything like a free or tolerable government to-day than they were 100 years ago. The ruling class as elsewhere at all times talk glibly of free government and practice the most pronounced oppression; profess great concern for the poor yet with unabated vigilance restrain them to the dead level of hopeless serfdom. These rulers have succeeded in their nefarious schemes from year to year and from decade to decade because they have been successful in denying to the masses all opportunity or chance of advancement, in deluding them from time to time with the promise of free homes and free government, but always denying the one and for the other giving them a most cruel, exacting, venal, blood-sucking aristocracy.

In 1856 in Mexico under Juarez—about the one real sympathizing patriot, so far as the masses were concerned, that Mexico ever produced—they wrote a remarkable constitution. I have it upon my desk and had intended to read from it, but I have not the time. It is a remarkable instrument. It divides the government into three parts—the legislative, the executive, and the administrative—and then they wrote a remarkable charter of principles. It was written by Juarez and his supporters, by those who constituted the masses or the governed class. As soon as it was put into effect, and as soon as it began to prevail in Mexico, the governing class conspired to destroy it, and the war between them has been going on from that time until now. Leaders like Juarez could not rely upon the masses. Yet many were able to read. Many were able to write. They could make constitutions. They were of exceptional intelligence for people who had been raised as they were. But the capacity for self-government was utterly a thing apart from the masses of the Mexican people. The result has been that you have had class war in Mexico from that hour until now; and, in my judgment, you will have the same question in the Philippines until those people are not only—if I could use the term properly—reconstructed but rehabilitated in their entire conception of self-government. Will some man tell me within what number of years we could do that?

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. LANE. I have listened with a great deal of interest to what the Senator has said, and I have noticed that he bases his argument that the Filipinos will be unable to govern themselves upon the assumption that for the past 300 years they have been saturated with examples of government set them by the Spanish. As a matter of fact, as I have read the history of the Philippine Islands, the Filipino people for 300 years were in revolt against the Spanish rule, and have never accepted it at any time, and never at any time within the 300 years of occupancy of that country by the Spanish people did the Spanish Governor General or any of his suite or any of his functionaries dare go outside of a walled city without danger of losing their lives. The Spanish influence never went beyond the reach of their cannon. The people of the interior of the country were in revolt against them for 300 years continually and constantly, and no Spanish Governor General in 300 years had his scalp safe on his head unless he stayed within or hugged close to a walled city. From within walled cities they tried to rule them, but the rule did not extend far outside of the wall. They did not become accustomed to or receive any inspiration from the Spanish rule. They fought it all down the line for all that time. They are amply prepared, if resistance and repugnance to that kind of a government prepare them, for freedom. They were held in check by the military power of Spain, but never admired or consented to the methods of conducting a government as it was conducted by that country. The lone 10 per cent to whom the distinguished Senator now refers were the people who lived inside of the walled cities, and not those who were free and out in the open country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon, because it entirely accentuates the view which I take of this situation. There is a way of saturating a man which is different from applying hot cloths. But this statement that was filed with the ex-President by the learned Filipinos said, as one of the arguments in favor of free government:

> When a people such as the Filipinos give signal evidence of their capacity to obey during a period of over 300 years, free from disturbance or deep political commotions, it must be granted, considering that all things tend to progress, that they possess the art of government; all the more so because, among other powers, they possess that of assimilation in a marked degree, an assimilativeness which distinguishes them from other people of the Far East.

I do not think there is any difference between the Senator and myself as to final results.

Now, let us view this preamble just a moment, for I am going to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] as a substitute for the preamble and a substitute for the bill, because that is the effect of it. It is a substitute. It is offered as an amendment, but the effect of it is to constitute it a substitute.

The preamble says:

Whereas it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines such an increasing control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without, in the meantime, impairing the sovereignty of the United States, in order that, by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers, they may be the better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence, which it is the purpose of the United States to grant when, in the judgment of the United States, it will be to the permanent interest of the people of the Philippine Islands.

No impartial tribunal is erected to pass upon that question; but the United States, when in its judgment it shall deem it to the permanent interest of the Filipino people to have independence, is going to grant that independence. To hold a people in subjection when you say to them, "You are practically prepared for independence," when as a matter of fact they are not practically prepared for independence and will not be for long years to come, is, in my judgment, to create disturbance, to breed revolution, to create discontent and dissatisfaction. It is to invite trouble. It is to make real progress in their interest most difficult, if not impossible.

If this bill passes with the preamble in it, within 90 days or six months those people will begin to feel that the time is ripening for their independence; that you could not have been talking about an independence in the far-off years; that it must be something that is practically now within their reach, and that they are practically fitted for it. The effect of the preamble would be to breed discontent among the people of the Philippines if you do not give them their independence within a very reasonable time.

If I am correct in my position that if we stay there for 5 years or 10 years or 15 years or 20 years and then give them their independence they will as a permanent proposition be no better fitted for self-government than they are now, we are going to have all kinds of trouble and difficulty within a very short time by reason of this preamble. They will construe it from their standpoint, and they will insist that they are entitled to have it construed from their standpoint and from what they believe to be their capacity for self-government.

I think it was Mr. Burke, the great English orator and philosopher, who said, in his speech on reconciliation with America, that—

Refined policy ever has been the parent of confusion and ever will be so long as the world endures. Plain, good intentions—

The orator continues—as easily discovered at first as fraud is sure to be detected at last, is, let me say, no mean force in the government of mankind. A genuine simplicity of heart is a healing and cementing principle.

This is the substance, if not his exact words.

I think of all things in legislation the most important is language which is not susceptible of misconstruction or misunderstanding. It ought to be plain, simple, direct, and positive. We ought not, in my judgment, even to discuss the question of independence with these people at this time if we are going to retain them until indeed they are fit for self-government.

Now, Mr. President, there is one other reason why I am inclined to support this amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In line with the statement the Senator has just made that they would not be fitted for self-government for decades and decades, does he not think that that would lead to insurrection and to revolts among the Filipino people?

Mr. BORAH. Well, if it did, then we are up against this proposition of postpoining that insurrection for a day only, because I can not conceive of the United States remaining in the Philippines for any purpose any longer except to educate the Filipino people in self-government. I do not see any other business we have there; I can not see any other reason for our remaining; and it is utterly untenable to my mind to assume that we can do that task or perform that duty inside of decades.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not understand that it is the purpose of the Senator from Idaho to make any declaration on the subject at all.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has stated his own view but it is no part of his purpose to insert in this measure such a declaration.

Mr. BORAH. Not at all.

Mr. President, there is one other feature of this question which is in one sense a peculiar one, and still it can not be ignored in this debate. For 17 years one of the great political parties of this country has assumed the position that the Filipino people ought to have their independence. That party is now in power in all the departments of Government. So far as the pledge of an opposite party is concerned it might not greatly concern me as a citizen of the United States and a member of another party, but we must deal with such questions from a little different viewpoint and at a different range, as it were intellectually, when we come to interpret those pledges in the light of what a dependent people expect and what they have a right to expect now. This campaign has been going on in this country, as I said, for nearly 20 years. In 1900, in 1904, and so on the great party now in power pledged itself to the giving of these people independence when they should come into power. There was no misunderstanding as to the meaning of that pledge in the campaigns. We may refine upon it here in the Senate Chamber, but the people of the United States understood it, and if the people of the United States understood it you may be assured that the Filipino people interpreted it even more strongly in favor of independence.

I will take a moment to recall those pledges, because they do not admit, in my judgment, of misconstruction, and are not to be ignored in the full and fair discharge of our duty:

We condemn the experiment in imperialism as an inexcusable blunder, which has involved us in enormous expenses, brought us weakness instead of strength, and laid our Nation open to the charge of abandoning a fundamental doctrine of self-government. We favor an immediate declaration—of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established, such independence to be guaranteed by us as we guarantee the independence of Cuba, until the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers. In recognizing the independence of the Philippines our Government should retain such land as may be necessary for coaling stations and naval bases.

This was in 1908—

It has been said here that that did not necessarily mean that the Filipino people were capable of self-government; that it might take some time. I refer to a speech by Mr. Bryan, made many years ago—and certainly the Filipinos are no less fit for self-government now than they were then—in which he said:

We are told that the Filipinos are not capable of self-government. That has a familiar ring. Only two years ago I heard the same argument made against a very respectable minority of the people of this country. * * * Self-government is a constant education; the capacity for self-government increases with participation in government. The Filipinos are not far enough advanced to share in the government of the people of the United States, but they are competent to govern themselves.

* * * * * * *

Give the Filipinos time and opportunity, and while they never will catch up with us, unless we cease to improve, yet they may some day stand where we stand now—

And so forth.

I could quote to any extent from similar sentiments made by not only the distinguished leader of the party at that time, and possessing some influence in his party still, I suspect, but other distinguished leaders of the party, to the effect that the declaration in the platform meant precisely what it said—that the Filipino people were fit for self-government and were entitled to complete independence. Now, that pledge has been in existence upon the part of this party for the last 17 or 20 years.

As I said, that party is now in power. For one, I am not going to stand in the way of a fulfillment of that pledge because it does not relate to me, as some of the platform pledges might as a citizen of the United States, but it is a pledge by this Government, as it is now controlled, to a dependent people.

Mr. Moorfield Storey, in interpreting this platform, said a few days ago:

Upon these statements of policy and these promises the Democratic Party has sought the support of the voters, and it has now received that support and is in full control of the Government. If words mean anything, it has promised to give the Filipinos their independence, and no man can trust it if this promise is broken. Why should any Democrat suggest that the policy which his party has so uniformly and so repeatedly pledged itself to adopt be now abandoned and the Republican policy which it has "condemned and denounced," which it has characterized as "an indefinite, irresponsible, discretionary, and vague absolutism," which it has called "an inexcusable blunder," be now adopted or by delay continued in operation?

That is a construction placed on the platform by one of the most intelligent and one of the ablest Democrats in the country. Now, what interpretation naturally have the Filipino people placed upon it, and if it is not carried out—if that pledge is not fulfilled—in what condition of mind does it leave the Filipino people in the Philippines?

In my judgment, Mr. President, we can not ignore those pledges as we might as Republicans if they were dealing with matters which related solely and wholly to our own country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, does the Senator from Idaho think that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas is a redemption of this pledge, which, as I understand him, is that the Filipinos shall be given immediate independence?

I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas proposes to give the Filipinos independence, perhaps, because it has a proviso which reads:

That if the President, at the expiration of the said period of four years, shall find that the condition of the internal or external affairs of said Philippines in respect to the stability or efficiency of the proposed government thereof is such as to warrant him in so doing, he is hereby further authorized, by proclamation duly made and published, to extend the said time to and including the date of the final adjournment of the session of Congress which shall convene next after the date of the expiration of the said period of four years, and thus afford the Congress an opportunity in its discretion to further consider the situation in the said Philippines.

So this extends independence with a string to it, which may be pulled back.

Mr. BORAH. It also provides that it shall go into effect unless Congress affirmatively rescinds or repeals this act.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Which Congress may very well do.

Mr. BORAH. Congress may very well do it, Mr. President. I am aware that it is an easy thing to pass resolutions in a political convention. I am also aware that to withdraw sovereignty where it has once obtained or to take the flag out of the sky with which it has become familiar is about the most difficult and tantalizing task that a people can undertake to perform. It is a very difficult thing to withdraw sovereignty.

I have no doubt that the Senator from Arkansas in offering this amendment had to accommodate himself to a situation and that there were those who were not willing to let the Filipinos go to-morrow or the next day, and, indeed, I presume, too, that it would be unwise, until the transfer of government could be made complete and efficient and effective, to do so; but it is a decided step, and in brief will be a conclusive step.

There is one thing that will be certain, and I think the Senator from Utah will agree with me. If that is passed, in at least five years from now those people will be free.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think that would follow at all.

Mr. BORAH. I think it does, for this reason: I have no fear in the world of Congress ever repealing this law if we start upon the proposition of independence.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The proviso that I have already read provides that the President may extend the time if, in his judgment, it appears that the conditions as to the stability or efficiency of the proposed government are such as to justify him in doing it. Of course if the conditions in that respect are such as to justify the President in extending the time, the language of the proviso, it seems to me, very clearly indicates that they will be sufficient to justify Congress in making some other disposition; and Congress may indefinitely extend the time or repeal the law altogether. It is not a hard and fast piece of legislation.

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I said, it is independence with a string to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator that if the date fixed in an act were absolute, four or five years from now, there would be a right in Congress to repeal the act. You can not make a legislative act which can not be repealed. Considering the exigencies that might arise, considering that we might be in a state of war at the time, it seems to me it would be very appropriate for the President to have the power to extend the time for a year, or even to extend it longer.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me, let me ask the Senator from Colorado, if the effect of the legislation is the same whether it contains this proviso or not, why put in the proviso?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; it is not the same.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I thought not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; it is not the same; but I believe, and I think the Senator believes, if this is passed, as the Senator from Idaho has said, it will end our jurisdiction over there within five years, not that Congress could not vote under that proviso to extend the time—it could extend the time under any statement that might be made—but a pledge made by Congress is not likely ever to be violated by either a subsequent Congress or by the people of the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What the Senator from Colorado says is true—that if the proviso was not here at all Congress would still have the power to repeal the legislation. There is not any doubt about that. But the difference would be that in the one case there would be a positive, absolute piece of legislation the terms of which Congress would have to violate if it repealed the law, whereas with the proviso in there is not any violation of the terms, because Congress will have reserved the right. It is precisely the thing we do very often in legislation which affects the rights of private individuals. We grant a right to construct a bridge, or something of that sort, and we give the grantee warning by putting in the legislation a provision that this law may be repealed or altered or amended by Congress at any time. We warn him in advance what we may do. It is not because it adds to the power of Congress, but we put it in as an express admonition that we are reserving our right to do that, instead of giving the understanding that the law is unalterable and irrepealable.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me a suggestion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If Congress should pass a law at this session giving the Filipinos their independence in four years, a subsequent Congress could repeal that. There is another point to which I wish to call the Senator's attention. If this amendment is ever written upon the statute books it goes to the people of America for their approval or disapproval, and no political party in power, in my judgment, will come back here four years hence instructed to undo the work.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator from Idaho will allow me, Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who seems to think the bill provides some method of extending the four-year term, if he has read the language in the bill which provides that in not more than four years independence shall be granted to the Philippine Islands. If that four years began on the 1st day of February, at 12 o'clock, it would compel the President of the United States four years from the 1st day of next February, at 12 o'clock, or at some time prior to that date to grant independence.

The bill then goes on to say that at the expiration of the period of four years—that is, at 12 o'clock four years from the 1st day of next February—after their independence has been granted under the terms of the bill, the President may consult Congress as to whether or not he shall continue the administration in the islands.

I will confess that under the conditions described in the language of the bill I am unable to see how it could be fulfilled. The bill provides that independence shall be granted before the time at which the President is allowed to consider whether or not it ought to be granted. The Senator from Idaho may want to vote for that provision.

Mr. BORAH. I do no think the view of the Senator is a correct view.

Mr. LIPPITT. I would be glad to have the Senator from Utah explain that provision if he is able.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I appreciate the great anxiety of the Senator from Rhode Island to have the views of the Senator from Utah, but really I would like to conclude and then let them enlighten one another later.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. COLT. I should like to ask the Senator how he reconciles his position of granting independence to the Filipinos with the other position which he has elucidated so ably that the people are not capable at the present time of establishing a stable form of government. If the people are not able at the present time to establish a stable form of government, does not the Government of the United States owe to them a duty which it does not fulfill by granting them independence now and thus setting them adrift before they are capable of maintaining any form of stable government?

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator a question in order to enable me to answer him more intelligently. How long does the Senator think, in view of the speech which he made this afternoon, it will take us to educate those people for self-government?

Mr. COLT. I have no idea how long it will take; and if the Senator presses me further upon that question I would say that I think we are bound to continue the same policy with the Filipino people which we have continued for 15 years, and that I would so treat the Filipino people in the future that at the time they might demand their independence they would then feel under such obligation to us that they would not desire their independence any more than Canada desires its independence from Great Britain to-day.

I can not forecast the future, but I do feel that we have a sacred duty to fulfill to these people who have been under our charge for more than 15 years, and to my mind it would be unbecoming this great Government now to set them adrift. Let us be consistent and not hesitate to fulfill the high duty and responsibility which has fallen upon us as a great power.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is very difficult to secure from even so eminent a jurist and so profound a student of history as the Senator from Rhode Island any suggestion at all as to how long it would take us to perform the task which he says it is our duty to perform.

I would agree with the Senator that there has arisen a certain moral obligation upon the part of this Government toward the Filipino people, but I am just as thoroughly convinced of the proposition as I would be of any other that could be possibly presented to my mind, that we are not going to remain in the Philippines long enough to teach them the capacity or the art of self-government, and that when you vote down the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas you vote to retain permanently the Philippine Islands.

So there are two questions here—first, whether you are going to retain the Philippine Islands permanently or, second, whether you are going to release them within a reasonable time, within such time as they can take into their hands the reins of government and assume jurisdiction over the islands.

Mr. COLT. May I ask the Senator whether we should take any action at this particular time? Why make any such declaration as is set forth in the Clarke amendment? Why not pass the bill which the committee has reported and let the matter rest there for the present?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have been seeking to explain during the afternoon why I think it is unwise to pass the bill as it is, because it promises independence, when at the same time we know that not within this generation or the succeeding generation will they be fit for self-government. I think that is eminently unwise legislation, but I think it foreshadows beyond a question what ultimately we are going to do, and that is to turn the Filipino people over to themselves or to their form of government within a time in which they will not be any better fitted for self-government than they are now.

Originally, Mr. President, I viewed this situation just as the former Senator from Massachusetts, Senator Hoar, and others did, that we ought not to have gone into the Philippine Islands at all. After we had gone into the islands and assumed certain obligations I became convinced that a moral obligation had arisen and we owed the Filipino people some duty, and we ought to perform that duty.

I have since become convinced, however, just as certainly, that under the political situation as it prevails from time to time in the United States this is going to be a political question until it is settled, and so long as it is a political question we will never teach the people of the Philippines that capacity for self-government which will enable them to deal with the question as we deal with self-government. It will be a political question in the United States, and party prejudices will be constantly changing policies in the Philippines.

I will call your attention to one who has studied this question as profoundly as any man in the United States, and who was originally as much in earnest with reference to holding the Philippines as any other man in the United States, who has defended the United States in its action upon the Philippines as effectively as any other man, and that is ex-Senator Root, where he says:

> If things are to be done in that way—

That is, if the Philippine question is always to be a political question—and it always will be a political question—> we had better give the islands their independence promptly; not promise it in the future, but give notice of an election and turn it over as we did with Cuba.

Undoubtedly the former Senator from New York has come to the conclusion that we are going to get out of the Philippine Islands before we shall have fully done that which he thought ought to have been achieved before we left the islands. He feels that under the conditions which are to prevail by reason of playing politics we ought to leave now.

That position, Mr. President, is the position which I assume in regard to the Clarke amendment. I am quite aware that it does not turn it over, as Senator Root says in his letter, but it takes the step which, in my judgment, will likely never be retraced.

In conclusion, it is my purpose to vote for the Clarke amendment, which, as I have stated, is in effect a substitute for the bill. I do so because, in the first place, I entertain no doubt that it is a wiser course than that outlined in the bill proper, carrying, as it does, this preamble.

I do so for the further reason that this Philippine question has been for 20 years a political question, more so now in a practical way than ever before. It seems clear that it is always to be a football of party politics, that a dependent people are to be tossed about by the vicissitudes of party interest. That being true, it is utterly impossible to perform adequately the great task before us in the Philippines. We are doing what we are doing at a tremendous risk, and as failure under these conditions seems certain I prefer to withdraw our sovereignty now.

There are other and controlling reasons which I have indicated in my remarks, but which I will not recapitulate. If we could have gone on as we started, keeping strictly to the task of teaching these people the art of free government and the principles of a higher civilization, withholding all promise of independence until we should approach something near the time of its fruition I would have been willing to remain longer. Indeed, if I thought we would stay until in a true sense this experiment had been fully tested I would have been willing to stay. But this bill and the sentiment behind it leads me inevitably to the policy outlined by the Clarke amendment. Of the two policies I think it preferable.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator, not controversial at all but to get his opinion. Why should the pending question dealing with the disposition of the Philippine Islands be a political or a party question? What is there about it that it should take on that attitude?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, theoretically, the Senator's inferences are quite correctly taken. It should not be a political question. But the Senator, of course, knows quite as well as I know that it is a political question, both here and in the Philippines.

Mr. STONE. Then does the Senator mean that one of the great political parties will favor the granting of independence to the Philippines in some form and that another one of the great political parties will oppose it?

Mr. BORAH. That has been the exact situation, I believe, for the last 17 years—the Republicans believing that the time was not yet at hand to promise independence.

Mr. STONE. Really I did not know that it had been a political or party question. To my thinking it ought to be so far removed from the field of party politics that I have not discovered that it was really a party question. I feel that Senators on a question of this kind ought to vote their opinion as to what is best for the country without any reference to party questions. If I am mistaken about it, and one party favors independence and the other is opposed to it, then am I to understand that the Democratic Party favors granting independence; and if it does that, the Republican Party is opposed to granting independence to the Filipino people?

I wanted to get near to an exact issue if possible, if there be such an issue, which I hoped there was not, and I have been inclined to believe that there was not.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Missouri looks entirely serious. There is an outward calm that is interesting.

Mr. STONE. And I am serious.

Mr. BORAH. But one of the most vital political questions that we have had in this country during one campaign, and incidentally important in all other campaigns, is the attitude of the two parties with reference to the Philippines. The Democratic Party pledged itself to independence.

Mr. STONE. That was 15 years ago.

Mr. BORAH. And ever since. You repeated it in the last platform. You say in the Democratic platform that you reassert and reavow all the things which you have said for the last 15 years with reference to the Philippines, and that you are in favor of carrying out the program, as you term it, and that, if put in power, you will do so. Here is the platform——

Mr. STONE. I am familiar with the platform. I know the attitude of the Democratic Party on the subject; but what is the attitude of the Republican Party?

Mr. BORAH. The attitude of the Republican Party was that we ought to stay in the Philippines until we enabled the Filipinos to exercise the art of self-government.

Mr. STONE. And the Senator from Idaho thinks that that may be 300 or 400 years.

Mr. BORAH. I am not at all averse to saying, Mr. President, I am not ashamed to say in the presence of this distinguished body, and I am not afraid to say in the face of history, that the Filipino people will not be fitted for self-government, upon any standard which has ever prevailed in a free government, inside of 200 years.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Wait just a moment. The Senator from Missouri is a historian; he challenged me upon that point the other day; and I now ask him to point me to a single instance where a people have ever acquired the art or capacity for self-government inside of 500 years?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I understand I was recognized a few moments ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado was recognized.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no desire to take the floor if the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has not yielded.

Mr. BORAH. I am going to yield now.

Mr. STONE. I undertook to interrupt the Senator from Idaho for a moment.

Mr. BORAH. I had intended to sit down, but the Senator from Missouri wanted to be enlightened as to the Democratic platform.

Mr. THOMAS. I wanted to ascertain my status on the floor.

Mr. STONE. I particularly wish to be enlightened as to the Republican attitude. You can never tell anything about a Republican platform; that goes as a matter of course. The Senator from Idaho asked me——

Mr. BORAH. Now, let us not discuss party platforms this afternoon, because that is an engaging subject.

Mr. STONE. Yes; and I will not do so, although the Senator from Idaho has provoked it.

There is a modern instance—a very recent instance—where I think the people concerned were no better qualified than are the Filipinos for self-government. I refer to Cuba.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, permit me merely to say that if you withdraw the protectorate of the United States from Cuba and take the lid off in Cuba you will see what kind of a self-government they have got there at this hour.

Mr. STONE. We have not any pretense of self-government in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, of course, an infant may walk so long as somebody holds him up, but—I do not say this disrespectfully—it is wholly misleading to assume for a moment that the Cuban people are trained now in the art of self-government.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish merely to say that there is, of course, no pretense of an independent self-government, or anything approximating it, in the Philippine Islands at this time. We are governing the Philippines; we make the laws for them; we supply them with American officials, and all that. So far as the Cuban people are concerned, it may be that the Senator's conjectures as to what might happen in certain contingencies might prove true.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. Very well. Mr. President, I did not know that the Senator from Colorado had the floor. I rose to make an inquiry of the Senator from Idaho before he took his seat, and he yielded to me before he did take his seat, but since the Senator from Colorado resents it——

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly good-natured about it. I simply was tired of "watchfully waiting." [Laughter.]

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Chair has anything to do with it, he will now recognize the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] asked the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] what the Republican platform says on this question. I happened to have the platform in my hand, and thought it would be appropriate to call attention to the platform of the Republican Party as in issue with the platform of the Democratic Party on that question in 1900. The Senator says he did not understand this was a party question, and yet in 1900 it was really the paramount issue of the campaign. I asked the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] to corroborate my recollection of that the other day, and I think he agreed with me that Mr. Bryan, as the candidate of the Democratic Party, made that what he called "the paramount issue."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state that I said that Mr. Bryan tried to make that question the paramount issue, but that the newspapers of New York would not let it be done, because they wanted the financial interests to become the paramount issue. I have no doubt they carried the eastern part of the country on the financial plank in the platform.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, Mr. Bryan, as the nominee of his party, did the best he could to make it the paramount issue, and consequently it was the issue. The Republican platform of 1900 said:

> In accepting by the treaty of Paris the just responsibility of our victories in the Spanish War, the President and the Senate won the undoubted approval of the American people. No other course was possible than to destroy Spain's sovereignty throughout the West Indies and in the Philippine Islands. That course created our responsibility before the world and with the unorganized population whom our intervention had freed from Spain to provide for the maintenance of law and order and for the establishment of good government and for the performance of international obligations.
> Our authority could not be less than our responsibility, and wherever sovereign rights were extended it became the high duty of the Government to maintain its authority to put down armed insurrection and to confer the blessings of liberty and civilization upon all the rescued peoples.
> The largest measure of self-government consistent with their welfare and our duties shall be secured to them by law.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator from Washington takes his seat, I wish to ask him a question. It seems that for the enlightenment of the American people the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is to be filled up with platform promises on this question. I want to ask the Senator if the Bull Moose Party has not very recently spoken on the question?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think so, Mr. President.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand that he has, and that he has declared in favor of getting out of the Philippines.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The platform of the Progressive Party contained no such declaration.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if he will not publish——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must insist that some little decent respect shall be shown to the Chair. The Chair recognized the Senator from Colorado. Does he yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LIPPITT. I simply want to ask the Senator from Idaho a question, if the Senator from Colorado will permit me to do so.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield, of course, but I hope the Senator's question will not open up another long debate.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Colorado, I simply desire to ask the Senator from Idaho, in connection with his quotation from Mr. Root, if he will not have published the entire letter of which the quotation was a part, so that it can be made plain just what Mr. Root's position is on that question?

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to have published in my speech anything that Mr. Root may say upon any subject.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have listened with close attention to the remarks of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] upon the pending bill, whose every utterance meets my hearty approval. I do not think it is possible for one people to educate another people to its standard of efficiency either in self-government or in any other sort of government. They may, of course, transmit many of their experiences and they may make a profound impression upon the governmental theories of the subject people; but the spirit of nationality, to which the Senator from Idaho so eloquently referred, is one which embraces, and which I think is inseparable from, those ideas of government which are peculiar to it and which have been evolved either through stages of barbarism or civilization, or both, into the standard which appeals to it, and which is also best and most adaptable to its needs.

I do not believe that if the United States retained the Philippine Islands forever for the sole purpose of educating the Filipinos into the capacity for self-government—and we do not pretend to retain them for any other—that such purpose would be accomplished; that is, from the standpoint of Anglo-Saxon ideals of self-government; nor do I believe that it could do so in any given time or indefinitely, nor that any duty has devolved upon us to do it, or that we should do it at all.

If I understand the attitude of some of the opponents of this measure, of which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] is a distinguished exponent, it is that out of our occupation and possession of the Philippine Islands has been evolved a duty—a solemn, unavoidable duty—resting upon the shoulders of the American people requiring them to transmit, before their protectorate shall be ended, no matter how long it may take, to the people of the Philippine Islands its own institutions, its own ideas of government, its own bases of society, its own methods of civilization; then it should turn them adrift, because they will then be perfectly able to take care of themselves.

Mr. President, I know of no recorded instance in history where anything of that kind ever took place, and I am confident that nothing of the kind ever did or ever will take place. The Senator, perfectly candid, as he always is, when face to face with the results of his doctrine, not only virtually concedes that that period of time will never come, but asserts that we should continue the policy in the hope that it would so far educate them as to destroy their sense or desire of self-government and make them so content with their lot that, like Canada, they will prefer their subjection to their independence; from which I infer that the Senator, recognizing the impossibility of the performance of the duty whose existence he asserts would continue the attempt to perform it until its purpose was visibly impossible of accomplishment, not only to the teacher but to the taught. By that time the old process of benevolent assimilation would have become effective, and the Filipinos, solely dependent upon us, would have lost their desire for liberty in their enjoyment of our mild and elevating overlordship.

Mr. President, I think that there is a duty which we owed to the Philippines when the Spanish War was ended; I think we still owe it to them; and I regret very much that we did not recognize and perform it away back in 1899 and 1900, as we should have done. It was pictured on this floor by the great Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, in one of the greatest orations that ever fell from human lips, filled with warnings not only as to the effect of our proposed policy on the Filipinos but upon our own institutions. The same note of warning was sounded at the other end of this building by the great Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. Reed. A former Senator from Vermont, still living I believe, used his pen in vigorous protest against what seemed to be to him a threatened violation of American principles, and a former Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. John G. Carlisle, in one of the most statesmanlike articles ever written, published, I think, in Harper's Monthly of September, 1899, pointed to the inevitable fact that we were about to embark upon a policy which would surely transform our traditional policy, violate the underlying principle of our institutions, and enter upon a career of colonization with the avowed object of what was then popularly known as "benevolent assimilation," whose results no man could foresee beyond the certainty of national misfortune. But the Nation was deaf to these appeals. We did not regard our duty then, Mr. President; we waved it aside and bought the Filipinos for $2 apiece, paying $20,000,000 for them and for their islands; we took forcible possession of them at once and have held them ever since, under the protest of a great portion of the American people and under a sort of common consent that at some time in the remote future we would withdraw from them and let them work out their own destiny.

I do not believe there is much difference between any of those who have considered the subject, whatever their political affiliations may be, about the general proposition that we should not remain indefinitely in the islands.

The difference is between those who would fix a definite time for leaving them and those who contend that it is impossible to fix a time because of the difficulty of performing the task which our duty has placed upon us within any specific period. That is ostensibly the difference; the real difference is, Mr. President, that some of us think we should get out of the islands as soon as we can, while others do not propose to get out of there at all, since they can very easily assign an indefinite time for final action, to be measured by our opinion of the capacity of the people for self-government, and then, as we are the judges as to when that time arrives, we can and will postpone it forever. We will thus remain in the Orient, albeit we protest that we have neither the desire nor the intention of doing so.

Mr. President, the real duty imposed upon the American people by our occupation of the islands is to me an obvious one. It has not been accomplished. It was evolved from the act of our occupation, and has continued and will continue until we perform it. That duty is to leave the islands as soon as we can do so decently, as soon as we can do so safely, as soon as we can do so with due regard to an avoidance of those disturbances which are inseparable from putting the change into effectual operation.

Mr. President, if there is a doctrine which may be said to contain a national policy for America it is what is popularly known as the Monroe doctrine, announced nearly a century ago, since which time it has received the unanimous and sometimes the overenthusiastic support of all the American people. It is familiar to all, and therefore not necessary that I should repeat it; I recall, however, that when the proposition was submitted to Mr. Jefferson he wrote Mr. Madison giving it his unqualified adherence, yet emphasized the corollary of the proposition; that America should avoid all entangling alliances abroad, keep her hands off the affairs of the Eastern Hemisphere, refrain from participation in European affairs, and confine her political activities to the western world; in other words, the doctrine involved mutuality of conduct and consistency of action whereby, as a consideration of our insistence upon its observance, we should restrict ourselves to our own and the affairs of our own hemisphere. But when the Philippines were taken over, Mr. President, we established an outpost 10,000 miles from our mainland, away off in the Orient, and by that act struck our own great Monroe doctrine a blow in the face. We repudiated our own policy, placed ourselves in direct antagonism with its principle, and gave the nations of Europe warrant for believing that our hunger for land had overcome our previous declaration of a doctrine whose adoption was essential to our freedom and with what seemed to be our manifest destiny.

It must never be forgotten that we owe duties, Mr. President, to ourselves quite as strong, and to my mind far stronger and more insistent, than any which have been imposed upon us with regard to the Philippines by reason of the relations which we voluntarily assumed and have occupied toward that country during the past 15 or 16 years. One of them, and perhaps the most important, is to so conduct our relations with other countries and other lands as to make our national policy of "hands off the American Continent" effective at all times.

What is one of the results, or one of the apparent results, of this policy of annexation? The so-called Clarke amendment provides—and, indeed, I think, it may be essential—that when the Philippine Islands are turned over to their own people, we shall seek to effectuate by treaty arrangement with other governments such provisions for their safety, their autonomy, and their neutralization as may be essential to their welfare; in other words, the duty which we have assumed, the obligation which we have imposed upon ourselves is not so much the attempt to educate the people of the Philippines to the impossible, as it is to make arrangements, possibly entangling alliances with other nations, for the betterment and welfare of a people with whom we should never have had any relations whatever. Where these treaties may lead us no man knoweth. But we do know that they are the outgrowth of our disregard of a national policy, whose overshadowing importance to ourselves has been the theme of every statesman and diplomatist since 1823. Yes; we must make alliances forsooth with other nations for the protection of an Asiatic people with whom we have nothing in common, whom we secured at the behest of commercialism rather than from any concern for their so-called civilization.

Mr. President, we hear a good deal in these exciting times about the need of preparation for national defense. The imagination of many good men and women easily pictures the menace of foreign invasion; the air and the sea and the land seem to them to be peopled with specters of danger ever approaching from every side, the more apprehensive because they are unreal and indefinite, yet many of those who really entertain the view that our alleged defenseless condition makes us a tempting victim to any of the great powers of the world are among those who would keep the Philippines indefinitely, either as a subject Province or as an outlying colony, which may become fitted through the exigencies of industry and of politics for admission to statehood. They insist upon keeping a land thousands of miles away from our coast, which is unprotected and undefended, and which therefore offers to any nation which may design to enter into a conflict with the American people the most tempting opportunity to begin hostilities, where it would be practically impossible for us to promptly meet and overcome it. Of course, an attack of that sort, Mr. President, arousing the national indignation and appealing to the national pride, would inevitably plunge us into a war, which perhaps never would have arisen but for the opportunity given to bring it on through the existence of these conditions which this bill, I think, would put an end to. In other words, Mr. President, the Philippines are a source of national danger. I think that the suggestion made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] a few moments ago of the attitude of ex-President Roosevelt concerning the problem is correct, if I have been properly informed as to what he has recently said about it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not fully informed as to the attitude of ex-President Roosevelt on the question. That, however, was not the question that was asked me by the Senator from Mississippi. He asked me as to the declaration of the Progressive Party platform on the question.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood the Senator from Mississippi to ask the Senator from Washington if the great leader of the late so-called Bull Moose Party had not recently announced himself in favor of an abandonment of the Philippine Islands. I may have been mistaken.

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; the question——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think I heard the Senator from Mississippi distinctly. On the contrary, he asked me if the platform of that party had not so declared, and I informed him that it had not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; I asked the Senator, in a facetious spirit, if the Bull Moose Party had not recently declared in favor of releasing the Philippine Islands.

Mr. POINDEXTER. They have not. That was the question, as I understood it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Then I said to the Senator that I understood that "he" had. [Laughter.]

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not catch the latter remark. I merely want to say that the attitude of Mr. Roosevelt was discussed here the other day, and a quotation from some of his utterances was made to show that he had been in favor of declaring to the Filipinos that we would give them their independence as soon as they were capable of self-government, but that construction of his utterance was disputed here, and I do not think that it was susceptible of that construction myself.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not care, of course, to raise the question whether or not my information was correct. I think, however, that the opinion of the late leader of the Bull Moose Party is much more important than the expression of the opinion of that party, which is now but a passing memory.

My understanding, however, is that the very point which I was just seeking to emphasize had impressed itself upon Col. Roosevelt, within the last four or five months at least, so strongly and so powerfully that, recognizing the danger involved in our exposed position away out across the seas, he suggested that it would be well to get rid of them, and get rid of them as soon as possible, especially, Mr. President, in view of the fact, as was well said by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], that the party now in power, having constantly promised to do this thing, could accomplish the purpose. Of course I do not pretend to quote the utterances of the ex-President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to give the exact quotation.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It was in Everybody's Magazine of January, 1915, in which Col. Roosevelt said:

> If we act so that the natives understand us to have made a definite promise, then we should live up to that promise. The Philippines from a military standpoint are a source of weakness to us. The present administration has promised explicitly to let them go, and by its actions has rendered it difficult to hold them against any serious foreign foe. These being the circumstances, the islands should at an early moment be given their independence without any guaranty whatever by us and without our retaining any foothold in them.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, for once I am in perfect accord with the ex-President of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I want for a moment to refer to the argument which is based upon the proposition that we should hold the Philippines until they are capable of self-government, which means, of course, that we must hold them until we think they have been educated up to our standard of political efficiency.

I contend that no nation has any right, that no nation can lawfully and justly acquire any right, to pass judgment upon the capacity of any other nation for self-government. It is none of our business whether the people of the Philippines are capacitated for self-government or not; and if we assume to judge, that judgment when tested by experience may prove to be worthless and erroneous.

Moreover, I deny that one people has the power to confer freedom and independence upon another, except by removing them from every constraint of overlordism. That is not the way in which freedom has been acquired by any people at any time in the history of mankind. Freedom, liberty, self-governing institutions have been won by the peoples who have enjoyed them by their struggles, their sufferings, and their sacrifices. One of the greatest Senators—Mr. Toombs, of Georgia—who ever occupied a seat in this body said, more than half a century ago:

> Liberty and freedom are the virtues of those who have acquired and fought for them without ceasing, and no nation can long retain them which is not at all times ready to die for them.

That is the test. If we are to keep these people in leading strings, the very fact will deprive them of that resourcefulness, that self-reliance, that experience which comes from hard knocks in government as well as in life, which is not only the test of character, but which develops it both individually and as a nation. The longer we hold these people, the longer one people hold any other in leading strings—provided, of course, their control is effective—the more remote is the possibility of self-government being developed among them.

And I want to say, Mr. President, that I am not much concerned whether the Filipinos, when they are given their freedom, as we call it, can or will govern themselves or not. I think we should be much more concerned in the reflex action and influence of our attitude concerning the Philippines upon our own institutions and upon the national character than we are in trying to educate them up to our own standards of self-government and then setting them adrift when we conclude that our task has been accomplished. They will ultimately have that government which comes from the evolution of tests and experience among themselves, and that will be the one to which they are entitled and for which they are adapted.

For my part, I do not care whether that ultimate government is a republic, a monarchy, or some other sort of a government. I am satisfied that it will be that which their experience ultimately develops, through a process of evolution and possibly revolution; and it is bound to be, in the last analysis, the one best fitted for them. They have a right to govern themselves in that way, if they see fit to do so, without any superposition upon them of our ideas, of our notions, or of our instructions, always, of course, giving them the benefit of the educational system which has been so effective up to this time, and has been the one redeeming feature of our occupation of the islands.

Government? Why, Mr. President, I think it was Plato who said of all governments that in their last analysis they were always the government of the strongest men. Even in our own form of government it is the strong men who dominate, and who, by impressing their personality and influence and leadership upon the machinery of government, make it effective or direct it for better or for worse.

So, as far as the future is concerned, while, of course, we may be largely interested in the results of our tutelage of those people, nevertheless the duty before us is one which we owe to ourselves, and it imperatively requires that we get rid of a subject people as soon as possible.

I was much taken some time ago with a reflection of the English historian, Mr. Froude. It is appropriate to the discussion. He said:

> If there be one lesson which history clearly teaches, it is that free nations can not govern subject provinces. If they are unable or unwilling to admit their dependencies to their own constitution, the constitution itself will fall in pieces from mere incompetence for its duties.

No more obvious truth was ever uttered.

These people, Mr. President, if we retain them, must become citizens, they must be admitted to our Constitution or the latter must fall because incompetent to discharge its functions. There can be no subjects in a republic. When he appears the republic becomes but a name. There can be, in a free republic, no subjects without doing violence to our institutions. They must be citizens if they stay; and those who oppose their independence must admit this or recognize a purpose of colonization. The present Speaker of the House of Representatives some time ago declared that the longer we continue to occupy these islands the greater the danger that politics may develop a situation which will ultimately lead to their admission as States of the Union. It is not, of course, improbable—indeed, it may be very likely—that if our constant occupation of these islands should lead to such a result the votes cast by an alien people 10,000 miles away might determine an election of a President of the United States at a most critical period in our political affairs.

Mr. President, I have not attempted any systematic discussion of this measure. But for the introduction of the amendment by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] I should have said nothing whatever upon it. But the amendment is, to my mind, the redeeming feature of the bill, and the criticism which I would make of it is that it does not go far enough. I should prefer to declare for their immediate independence. I think the analysis by Moorfield Storey of the Democratic platform upon the subject, as read here by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], is absolutely unanswerable. We have promised, ever since there was a Philippine question—and when I say "we," I mean the party to which I belong—we have pledged and declared over and over again that if and when we were restored to power we would give these people their independence. Now, we either meant it or we did not. I do not think there is any question about our candor and earnestness in this repeated declaration of good faith. But there will be if we ignore or disregard it.

I am glad we made it. It is true Democratic doctrine. It is an essential to the welfare of the people from the Democratic standpoint. It has become crystalized as a fixed principle of Democratic policy that upon our accession to power we would get rid of these islands. The only way to carry out that pledge, Mr. President, is to keep it by fixing some definite, arbitrary time when, regardless of consequences, the present relations between this Government and the Philippine Islands will terminate, when we will get out of there and come home, and when from that time onward the people of the islands will be left to themselves, to govern themselves as in their judgment they should and to look after their affairs in their own way.

My objection to this amendment is that the time suggested is too long, and that no contingency should be attached to the date when the bill becomes operative. But I am not one of those who rejects half a loaf because he can not get all that he wants. I think this, perhaps, is the best thing that can be done at present, the most efficacious thing, the most practical thing. Therefore I shall support this amendment, Mr. President, believing that in so doing I am not only following the dictates of my own judgment with regard to the question, but I am also carrying out and making effective the oft-repeated declarations of the Democratic Party upon this subject. I trust that when we are rid of the Philippines, when we have that episode of our history behind us, we will have learned a lesson from that experience so strong and so vivid and so constant as to make its repetition impossible.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 25, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 24, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for the dignity Thou hast conferred upon man, for it is writ, "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor; Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands; Thou hast put all things under his feet."

Give us therefore the courage of our convictions that whatsoever we put our hands to this day we may glorify Thee and thus glorify ourselves in the work whereunto Thou hast called us, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in all our hearts; in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journals of the proceedings of Saturday, January 22, 1916, and Sunday, January 23, 1916, were read and approved.

PARCEL POST.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the parcel post.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the parcel post. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes on the subject of preparedness and national defense.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the clearing of the business on the Speaker's table, he be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes on the subject of national preparedness. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I may address the House for 30 minutes upon the same general subject.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to withhold that for another day. We are right in the middle of the consideration of the good-roads bill. If we do not finish the bill to-morrow it will run us into Calendar Wednesday, with other important matters coming up. Why can not the gentleman wait for a day or two?

Mr. BENNET. I ask for only 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] asks unanimous consent that after the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] he be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes on the same general subject of preparedness. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. HOWARD rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. HOWARD. To submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a letter from Hon. Charles Hall Davis, of Petersburg, Va., which is a criticism of H. R. 6838, known as the Moss rural-credit bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter written by Charles Hall Davis, of Petersburg, Va., on the Moss rural-credit bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Georgia the length of the communication and what the nature of it is?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, I will state that Mr. Davis is considered, in my judgment and by all of the people who have devoted any study to the question of rural credits, to be one of the greatest experts on that subject in the United States. He was the secretary to a former joint committee of the House and Senate, and practically drafted all of the organization features of every bill that is now before Congress for everyone who introduced them. He knows more about the question and is more vitally interested in it, from the standpoint of the farmers of the country, than any man I know of. This is a reply to a communication addressed to him by me, asking him to take the Moss bill and criticize it from the standpoint of an expert, and he has done so, and I will say to the gentleman that he has criticized it down to the bone.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ACTING CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

JANUARY 24, 1916.

To the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE:

Desiring to be absent from my office for a short period of time, I hereby designate the Chief Clerk of the House, J. C. South, Esq., to sign all papers that may require my official signature, and to do all other acts under the rules and practice of the House required to be done by the Clerk of the House.

Respectfully submitted.

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House.

PRINTING BILL.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent, and ask to have it read from the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARNHART asks unanimous consent that House bill No. 8664, known as the printing bill, be given a privileged status, with one hour's general debate, subject to preference being given to consideration of appropriation, revenue, and regularly privileged bills, and with the definite agreement that while this bill is being considered it may be displaced at any time for the consideration of the aforesaid bills.

Mr. BARNHART. And other bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to say that there are other bills that are to be proposed that are not privileged, but that are of very great importance, a part of the program of this session of Congress, and for the present I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Until at least the good-roads bill gets out of the way, and when that is out of the way, if there is nothing else, I may not object.

RURAL POST ROADS.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7617.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7617, rural post roads, with Mr. RUCKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7617) to provide that the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall, in certain cases, aid the States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it is well known by my fellow Members upon this floor that I heartily favor Government aid to good roads. I have heretofore, on more than one occasion, discussed this great question, in which the people are so vitally interested, on the floor of this House.

When the bill appropriating $25,000,000 for the improvement of good roads passed the House of Representatives in 1912, which I am sorry did not pass the Senate, I had the honor and pleasure of making the closing speech in favor of that bill, and was very much gratified to receive from Hon. DORSEY W. SHACKLEFORD, the present chairman of the Roads Committee, and the distinguished gentleman who is now in charge of this bill on the floor of the House, a letter thanking me for my assistance on that occasion. I hope it will not be deemed indelicate on my part to read you that letter, which is as follows:

WASHINGTON, April 30, 1912.

MY DEAR MR. CANDLER: I must go away to-night and be gone for some days. I will not be able to see you before I go, so I write this note to thank you for persistent and intelligent assistance rendered in the preparation and passage of the so-called Shackleford good-roads bill. You did splendid service in getting the bill reported from the Committee on Agriculture. I believe it was upon your motion that the bill was reported. But the best of it all was your masterful speech in closing the debate on the bill in the House to-day. It was a complete and convincing answer to those who argued that our measure was undemocratic. The people owe you much thanks for your efforts in their behalf.

With best wishes, I am,

Your friend, DORSEY W. SHACKLEFORD.

[Applause.]

I heartily supported the bill on that occasion and I with equal enthusiasm support the pending bill. On the first day of this session of Congress I introduced a bill on this subject myself. Quite a number of bills were introduced by other Members of Congress, and this bill is presented as a composite bill, intended to utilize the best features of various bills on this subject. This bill has the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture and has received the unanimous approval of every member of the Committee on Roads, and hence it is evident that this measure has a more unanimous and larger support than any other bill could possibly secure, and therefore it is evident that the best course to pursue is for every Member who honestly and sincerely favors Government aid to good roads to get behind this bill and by vote and influence put forth every effort to secure its passage. If it does not measure up fully to all the varied conditions existing throughout the country, when it is put into operation, that will be made evident, and it can then be so amended as to meet future emergencies and contingencies. The bill is as follows:

A bill (7617) to provide that the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall, in certain cases, aid the States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall, in certain cases, aid the States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads; that for the purposes of this act the term "rural post road" shall be held to mean any public road over which rural mail is, or might be, carried outside of incorporated cities, towns, and boroughs having a population exceeding 2,000 and in said cities, towns, and boroughs having a population exceeding 2,000 along streets and roads where the houses average more than 200 feet apart; that not more than $25,000,000 shall be appropriated under the provisions of this act for any fiscal year.

SEC. 2. That out of an appropriation made under the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall deduct the sum which he shall deem necessary to defray the expenses of his department in the administration of this act, and apportion the balance of said appropriation for expenditure under the provisions of this act in the several States in the following manner: Sixty-five thousand dollars to each State and one half of the remainder in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the population of all of the States as shown by the latest available Federal census, and the other half of such remainder in the ratio which the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes in such State bears to the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes of all the States as shown by the latest available report of the Postmaster General.

SEC. 3. That as soon as may be after the passage of any act making appropriations under the provisions of this act, the Secretary of Agriculture shall prepare and file in his office a statement showing the amount of such appropriation he has set apart to defray the expense of his department in the administration of this act and the amount of the balance which will be available for expenditure in each State, and transmit a copy of such statement to the State highway department of each State which has such a department, and to the governor of each State which has not such a department; that the State highway department of any State, after receiving such statement, may apply to the Secretary of Agriculture for aid under the provisions of this act in the construction or maintenance of any rural post road in such State; and if, in his judgment, such road is one to the proposed construction or maintenance of which aid should be given under the provisions of this act, then he shall request such State highway department to furnish him with surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost of said proposed construction or maintenance, and any other information which he may consider proper; that he shall examine said surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost and determine what would be the reasonable cost of such construction or maintenance and what amount of aid will be given under the provisions of this act to such proposed construction or maintenance, which shall in no case be less than 30 nor more than 50 per cent of what he has so determined would be the reasonable cost of such proposed construction or maintenance, and shall forthwith transmit to said State highway department a written statement of his said determinations; that upon receipt of such written statement the said State highway deparment may transmit to the Secretary of Agriculture a statement in writing notifying him that such propcsed construction or maintenance will be undertaken upon the terms proposed; that thereupon the proper authorities of the State may, in accordance with the laws of such State, commence and prosecute said construction or maintenance in substantial compliance with said surveys, plans, and specifications; that when the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that said construction or maintenance of said road has been finished in substantial compliance with said surveys, plans, and specifications he shall cause to be paid to the proper authority of said State whatever remains unpaid of the amount which he has stated, as hereinbefore provided, would be given to aid said State in said proposed construction or maintenance of said road; that the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, from time to time make payments upon such construction or maintenance as the same progresses, but these payments, including previous payments, if any, shall in no case be more than the pro rata part of the United States of the value of labor and materials which have been put into such construction or maintenance.

SEC. 4. That all construction and maintenance of roads under the provisions of this act shall be under the supervision and control of the State highway departments of the several States: Provided, That until January 1, 1920, the amount which has been apportioned to be expended in any State which has no State highway department shall be available for expenditure in such State in such manner as shall be agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and the governor of such State; that the Secretary of Agriculture may make, or cause to be made, such inspection and examinations of any road constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act as he shall deem necessary, and he may prescribe what reports shall be made to him by the State highway department of any State in relation to any road in such State to the construction or maintenance of which aid under the provisions of this act has been given or sought, when such reports shall be made, and the form and subject matter of the same; that the Secretary of Agriculture shall have power to employ such assistants, clerks, and other persons in the city of Washington and elsewhere, to purchase such materials and supplies, and to prescribe such rules and regulations for the administration of this act as he may consider expedient.

SEC. 5. That the necessary culverts and bridges shall be considered as parts of the roads constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act; that the roads which may be constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act shall include earth, sand-clay, sand-gravel, and other common types of roads, as well as roads of higher classes, one of the purposes of this act being to encourage and promote the improvement of a general system of roads leading from cities, towns, and railway stations into the adjacent farming communities.

In section 5 it will be noticed it is stated that—one of the purposes of this act is to encourage and promote the improvement of a general system of roads leading from cities, towns, and railway stations into the adjacent farming communities.

The purpose, therefore, is to benefit our agricultural interests.

It will be seen by reading this bill that it provides that each and every State shall receive an arbitrary amount of $65,000, and in addition to this a proportionate amount in accordance with the number and length of the rural-delivery routes and the star routes and the population within the State. It is estimated that Mississippi would receive $497,130 each year under this bill. This is probably the fairest apportionment which could be made. If this measure is passed it will be a beginning of this great development in the United States, and as time may show it to be necessary the good work can be increased and enlarged as good policy and necessity may indicate and require.

This is no new question. The first American road law was passed by the General Assembly of Virginia in 1632. The Egyptians, Persians, and Romans built roads in their day. The present system of roads in France was founded by Napoleon. England had road legislation as early as 1285. The nations beyond the seas now have splendid roads, and it is time for this great Republic—the greatest in the history of the world—to begin and press to success the improvement of the highways in the interest of all the people. The Democratic Party in its last national platform declared in favor of National aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads. We must redeem that pledge if we keep faith with the people. Our forefathers, as time has demonstrated, builded well in their day, and in the first 50 or 60 years in the history of this Republic something like $14,000,000 was appropriated for the building and maintenance of public highways, and during the time the construction of the Cumberland Road was accomplished. Let us now gather inspiration from their splendid example and carry to consummation this great enterprise. [Applause.] There is nothing that would benefit the people more than good roads. They will increase the value of land, put neighbors closer together, bring the schoolhouses and churches nearer, and with their convenience exercise a beneficent influence which will bless all mankind. We have given to our rural population rural delivery of the mails and the parcel post, and now let us add to this a system of good roads and a rural-credit system, backed by Government aid, and this country will blossom like the rose, and prosperity, like the blessed sunshine, will shed its inspiring influence in every neighborhood in this magnificent Republic. Congress has waited too long now to give the people good roads and a rural-credit system. They need money at low rates of interest with which to improve their farms and produce their products, and good roads over which to transport their products to market. Both these great measures have been promised by the Democratic Party, and we are in control of this Government, and if we are to deserve and receive the further confidence of the people we must keep faith with them and redeem these two among our most important pledges and promises made to them. I voted for a rural-credit bill last Congress and shall gladly do so again, and do all I can to secure legislation. I heartily favor the passage of this road bill and will vote for it with pleasure, and I earnestly urge every friend of the people in this House to support it and thus make certain its passage. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, it is with deepest regret that I follow the arguments which have been advanced by certain gentlemen on the floor of this House against this worthy measure. I am surprised that gentlemen who have spoken so ably and so well on other important questions should take the stand that has been taken against this bill.

To my mind it would appear that every sane and thinking American citizen can not but admit that any improvement in the roads throughout the country will result in benefit to the cities.

Transportation has brought people closer together and made commercial intercourse easier. Our great railroads have made it possible for thousands of American citizens to reach and develop land which otherwise would still be dormant.

In 1832 the railroads of the United States were operating 229 miles of trackage. Three years later, through the help of Congress, they were operating 1,098 miles of track. At the opening of the Civil War railroad mileage had been increased to 31,286 miles, and to-day they are operating over 260,000 miles of track.

Our interurban electric railways have brought cities and towns closer together, and these lines are now penetrating sections of the country which could not be reached by steam roads. Electric railways have made it possible for thousands of our city population to move into the suburbs and secure better and cheaper homes.

If Congress can be induced to give the same assistance to public roads as was given to railroads when steam transportation was so sorely in need of assistance, I feel sure that the country at large will benefit to an even greater extent than it did through the loan by Congress, which was the means of the beginning of this great development in railroad construction.

But the highways of the country, I regret to say, have been criminally neglected by our Nation. If they had received the same attention as the railroads and electric railways, our country would have a perfect system of highways, which, bringing the producer closer to the consumer, would do much to reduce the cost of living in this country.

In the last 20 years we have expended over $2,000,000,000 for our Army and Navy. If one-twentieth of that sum had been expended on our roads, I feel sure that the country would have been benefited to a much greater extent than it has through the expenditure of this immense sum for the maintenance of Army posts which protect us against savage Indians long since dead and the maintenance of a large Navy to protect us against foreign enemies who would be obliged to transport their armies over 3,000 miles of water before they could land on our shores. With every foreign power bankrupt, the gentlemen would appropriate still larger sums to build up a Navy to protect us against enemies from whose sting the venom has been removed for 20 years to come. The gentlemen will readily appropriate millions of dollars for the maintenance of troops in the Philippine Islands and the Panama Canal, but ask them to spend a like amount for the improvement of our home territory and they are deaf.

If the gentlemen are looking for war, if they are expecting it, let them take into consideration the fact that armies must be moved from one section of the country to another and that immense quantities of supplies must also be transported. It is not always that railroads can be depended on for this transportation, and in that event we must look to our highways to solve the problem of shifting troops and supplies.

In these times of peace every progresesive district and every enterprising town is devoting a great deal of thought and energy to the improvement of its roads, and it is high time that the National Government should do likewise.

I believe in economy, but not in false economy. I believe that the money that this bill calls for will be a splendid investment, and feel confident that the people of the United States will receive from it greater benefits than they would from any other project to which it might be applied.

I do not share the fear of some of my colleagues that the improvement of the roads will benefit the rural districts alone. Anything that is of benefit to the producing area must of necessity be of benefit to the cities.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, and I shall cast my vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I observe with regret and pain that some of my esteemed colleagues from the large cities and thickly populated communities object strenuously to the expenditure of money to help construct roads in rural communities sparsely settled. I beg to remind the gentlemen that while God made the country and man made the cities, the best men who have made the best cities, with very few brilliant and distinguished exceptions, came from the country that God made and will continue to do so. [Applause.]

I wish to call their attention to the injustice of requiring that these partially settled communities, in the very territory whence the resources as well as the men come, to build up and perpetuate the cities, should build their own roads, all of which tend to the benefit of the cities.

And I wish to say to the committee that I am corroborated by very strong authority in that line. Macaulay, writing of the situation in England in the seventeenth century, said:

One chief cause of the badness of the roads seems to have been the defective state of the law. Every parish was bound to repair the highways which passed through it. The peasantry were forced to give their gratuitous labor six days in the year. If this was not sufficient, hired labor was employed, and the expense was met by a parochial rate. That a route connecting two great towns, which have a large and thriving trade with each other, should be maintained at the cost of the rural population scattered between them is obviously unjust; and this injustice was peculiarly glaring in the case of the great North Road, which traversed very poor and thinly inhabited districts and joined very rich and populous districts. Indeed, it was not in the power of the parishes of Huntingdonshire to mend a highway worn by the constant traffic between the West Riding of Yorkshire and London. Soon after the Restoration this grievance attracted the notice of Parliament, and an act, the first of our many turnpike acts, was passed, imposing a small toll on travelers and goods for the purpose of keeping some parts of this important line of communication in good repair.

In a city or a thickly settled community the number of people interested, traveling the road and paying tax, make it easy per capita to defray the expense of a good road, but in a sparsely settled country it would be too onerous on the people, none of whom are wealthy, to keep in order long stretches of road, mainly to be used by people from the cities traveling over them.

The people in my part of the country are accepting and acting upon those views. The cities and large towns are actively cooperating with the intervening rural communities and are helping to build good roads connecting the cities, large towns, and county seats, but they ought to have assistance from the Government. In the large cities and populous and wealthy communities that have already been blessed with the bounteous benefits of the rapid growth and unparalleled prosperity of this country the past hundred years are the last ones who ought to object to a fair and equitable plan for aiding in the construction of roads through the parts of the country less fortunate, up to this time, in population and prosperity. Their resources and prospects are so fine as to insure ample returns to the Government and the rest of the people for all the assistance that can be rendered now. The objection is shortsighted and ungracious.

I have been introducing bills for many years and have conferred and cooperated with the authors of other bills which promised any benefits to the people of the rural communities, and I shall vote for this bill, not because I believe it is the best bill, but because I believe it is the only one we can agree upon, and it does possess great merit.

I presume all are more or less acquainted with the wretched condition of the roads in many of the rural communities, especially where in bad wintry weather the people are compelled to use their vehicles in going to and from market. I can not better describe the situation in some of the communities than to read you the following extracts from Macaulay's History of England describing very similar conditions:

The chief cause which made the fusion of the different elements of society so imperfect was the extreme difficulty which our ancestors found in passing from place to place. Of all inventions, the alphabet and the printing press alone excepted, those inventions which abridge distance have done most for the civilization of our species. Every improvement of the means of locomotion benefits mankind morally and intellectually as well as materially, and not only facilitates the interchange of the various productions of nature and art, but tends to remove the national and provincial antipathies and to bind together all the branches of the great human family. In the seventeenth century the inhabitants of London were, for almost every practical purpose, farther from Reading than they now are from Edinburgh, and farther from Edinburgh than they now are from Vienna.

The subjects of Charles the Second were not, it is true, quite unacquainted with that principle which has, in our own times, produced an unprecedented revolution in human affairs, which has enabled navies to advance in face of wind and tide, and brigades of troops, attended by all their baggage and artillery, to traverse kingdoms at a pace equal to that of the fleetest race horse. The Marquis of Worcester had recently observed the expansive power of moisture rarefied by heat. After many experiments he had succeeded in constructing a rude steam engine, which he called a fire waterwork, and which he pronounced to be an admirable and most forcible instrument of propulsion. But the marquis was suspected to be a madman, and known to be a Papist. His inventions, therefore, found no favorable reception. His fire waterwork might, perhaps, furnish matter for conversation at a meeting of the Royal Society, but was not applied to any practical purposes.

It was by the highways that both travelers and goods generally passed from place to place, and those highways appear to have been far worse than might be expected from the degree of wealth and civilization which the nation had even then attained. On the best lines of communication the ruts were deep, the descents precipitous, and the way often such as it was hardly possible to distinguish in the dusk from the uninclosed heath and fen which lay on both sides. Ralph Thoresby, the antiquary, was in danger of losing his way on the great North Road, between Barnby Moor and Tuxford, and actually lost his way between Doncaster and York. Pepys and his wife, traveling in their own coach, lost their way between Newbury and Reading. In the course of the same tour they lost their way near Salisbury and were in danger of having to pass the night on the plain. It was only in fine weather that the whole breadth of the road was available for wheeled vehicles. Often the mud lay deep on the right and left and only a narrow track of firm ground rose above the quagmire. At such times obstructions and quarrels were frequent, and the path was sometimes blocked up during a long time by carriers, neither of whom would break the way. It happened almost every day that coaches stuck fast until a team of cattle could be procured from some neighboring farm to tug them out of the slough. But in bad seasons the traveler had to encounter inconveniences still more serious. Thoresby, who was in the habit of traveling between Leeds and the capital, has recorded in his Diary such a series of perils and disasters as might suffice for a journey to the frozen ocean or to the Desert of Sahara.

He was afterwards detained at Stamford four days on account of the state of the roads, and then ventured to proceed only because 14 members of the House of Commons, who were going up in a body, took him into their company. On the roads of Derbyshire travelers were in constant fear for their necks and were frequently compelled to alight and lead their beasts. The great route through Wales to Holyhead was in such a state that, in 1685, a viceroy going to Ireland was five hours in traveling 14 miles, from St. Asaph to Conway. Between Conway and Beaumaris he was forced to walk a great part of the way, and his lady was carried in a litter. His coach was with much difficulty and by the help of many hands brought after him entire. In general, carriages were taken to pieces at Conway and borne on the shoulders of stout Welsh peasants to the Menai Straits. In some parts of Kent and Sussex none but the strongest horses could in winter get through the bog, in which at every step they sank deep. The markets were often inaccessible during several months. It is said that the fruits of the earth were sometimes suffered to rot in one place, while in another place, distant only a few miles, the supply fell far short in the demand. The wheeled carriages were in the district generally pulled by oxen. When Prince George of Denmark visited the stately mansion of Petworth in wet weather he was six hours in going 9 miles; and it was necessary that a body of sturdy hinds should be on each side of his coach in order to prop it. Of the carriages which conveyed his retinue, several were upset and injured. A letter from one of the party has been preserved, in which the unfortunate courtier complains that during 14 hours he never once alighted except when his coach overturned or stuck fast in the mud.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT].

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, it is needless for me to say that I am heartily in favor of the passage of this bill. I have in former Congresses worked for and supported similar measures for Government aid to the construction of post roads in the United States. This bill was reported from the Committee on Roads, of which I am a member. The committee had before it many bills to consider; while they differed in their provisions and language used, yet the object sought was the same, all providing for aid by the Federal Government in the construction of highways in the interior country of the United States. What I may say on this subject will, to a large measure, be what I have heretofore said upon this floor in advocating the passage of legislation along the line of the provisions of this bill. In fact, it seems to me it would be almost impossible to advance a new idea upon this subject, as so many gentlemen in previous Congresses and at the present session have discussed this subject, and all that could possibly be said has been said.

Some objection has been raised to the provisions of this bill, and it has been said that its provisions were not as good as the bill that passed the House during the Sixty-third Congress. I confess that I can not say that I like the provisions of the pending bill better than I did the bill passed by the House in the Sixty-third Congress, yet after hearing the ideas advanced by different advocates of the measure in committee, and after the question was thoroughly considered by our committee, it was thought best to report the bill that is now being considered. If the desire of Members to speak in favor of this bill indicates the way they are to vote, I take it that there will be a very small vote against its passage; in fact, it looks as if the vote would be all one way.

This bill carries an appropriation of $25,000,000, and under its provisions the Secretary of Agriculture would first apportion to each of the States $65,000 and the remainder of the twenty-five million would be then divided among the several States as follows: One-half in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the population of all the States, as shown by the latest available Federal census, and the other half of such remainder in the ratio which the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes in such States bears to the mileage of the rural free delivery and star mail routes of all the States, as shown by the latest available report of the Postmaster General. The administration and expenditure of the money hereby appropriated is under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, acting in conjunction with the State highway departments of the several States or the person charged with the duty of looking after the highways in States having no highway department. I agree with the provision which places the control and expenditure of this money in the Secretary of Agriculture. This power must be delegated to some one, and we must proceed upon the assumption and theory that any officer qualified will exercise it with discretion and good faith and to the best interest of those who are to receive the benefits of same. Again, I can see an advantage to be gained.

It is true that men in the rural districts charged with the administration of road funds and road laws, however conscientious and earnest they may be, can not be skilled in road engineering, and for this reason most all of the highway departments of the States extend the aid of the highway departments to the local road authorities. Under the provisions of this bill the highway commission, upon the application of the road district, will send an engineer to provide scientific road construction and give advice as to the best material for road improvement in the immediate locality where the road is to be constructed. Without such engineering and without such advice of some one skilled in road construction the officials in the rural communities would often be helpless and would not be in a position to properly construct the roads.

What is now being done in many States by local legislation is proposed to be done under this bill by the Federal road departments and will result in great road improvement, thus giving to the local communities all of the scientific knowledge by the Office of Good Roads after years of study and expense. The Secretary of Agriculture will be able to be at the service of the local road officials of the States by giving them the assistance of expert engineers and road builders, who are familiar with the construction of roads in different parts of the United States; familiar with the quality of material available in the different sections; familiar with the process of drainage, which is an important feature in road construction; familiar with all the details which reduce the cost of road construction and improvement and which result in a more economic up-keep of the same.

In my State we have 937 rural routes, with an aggregate length of 25,504 miles; we also have 288 star routes, with an aggregate length of 4,125 miles; hence the amount that would be apportioned to Oklahoma under the provisions of the pending bill would be $532,138. While this amount is small, it will materially aid in the much-needed and long-delayed work of road building in the rural communities of the State. If this bill becomes a law, it will benefit more people than any measure that has been passed by Congress in many years.

The passage of this bill is not political in its nature, and in discussing its provisions no one can be charged with supporting the measure because it is political. I am indeed anxious to see legislation giving to the States aid in construction of post roads throughout the United States. I very much regret to hear any gentleman speak in opposition to this measure; however, I find no fault and do not feel like criticizing anyone who honestly opposes any measure that is being considered by this House. Any gentleman has a right to his views, and he is responsible to his constituents for his vote, and if he, after study, is convinced that it is not proper and beneficial legislation, I honor him for saying so; but I do appeal to his better judgment and ask him not to vote against this measure from a selfish motive or because he feels his section of the country will not profit thereby. All of the people of the United States will be benefited if this measure becomes a law. I regret very much to see my friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] oppose the pending legislation. Last Congress he voted with those who desired to see the measure become a law, yet if he has by study and research convinced himself that he should not support this measure because his constituents do not need it, and in his opinion it will not benefit the communities; that it is not just legislation and not such an enterprise as the Government of the United States should enter upon, I take it that it is his duty to oppose it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] in the course of his remarks calls some of these roads that are sought to be improved "cow paths." May I not suggest to the gentlemen that these roads as arteries of commerce are contributing largely to the upbuilding of large cities in the New England States, and to the great city of Boston, from which the gentleman comes. The wealth of the cities was not produced in the cities. No city in any part of the United States produced its wealth and no city would long remain a city if it had to depend upon the products manufactured and produced within that city. But the great wealth of the metropolis of New York and every large city was produced from the rural sections of the United States and centralized, because of the great advantages of commerce and the methods of transportation of the products to the different parts of the world.

The city and the country must each rely upon the other, and it is by an exchange of their commodities that keeps our commerce going and maintains our producing powers, consequently it is not a question of city or town against the country, but it is as much the interest of the individual in the city and town to see that the producer of wealth from the farm in the rural districts is provided with good facilities for transporting his products from the farm to market as it is to see that they have good streets and sidewalks in the city.

The question of Government aid in the construction of public roads or the question of road building in the United States has for many years been discussed, but within the last few years a greater interest is being manifested and a greater realization for the necessity of road construction has been brought forward than ever before in the history of our Government. It is easy to understand why, because of the fact that our cities and towns are being so densely populated that it has become necessary that a greater acreage of lands in the country must be cultivated to maintain and support them, and in order that the farms may be properly cultivated, and society built up in the rural communities, that the people have awakened to the necessity of road building and believe that the Government should assist them in the construction of the same.

It is true that at present great agitation exists regarding the question of our Government being prepared to meet a foreign foe, and that the War and Navy Departments are advocating large expenditures for the purpose of strengthening our Army and Navy, our coast defenses, and that the same has been presented to Congress by our President; yet with all of the anxiety and desire for preparedness that is presented not one sentence, not one effort, not one move is made to prepare our cross-country roads for the proper defense should it become necessary to move our armies from one place in the United States to another. At present we would necessarily have to rely upon the steam railroad for transportation. A large portion of the success of the German Army in the unfortunate war that is now raging in the East has been brought about by reason of the fact that they heretofore constructed good roads, and such roads that they could transport thereon their heavy artillery and their necessary munitions of war, and do not have to rely upon railway transportation.

It will be but a few days until many of the gentlemen who are opposing this measure will be called upon to cast their vote for preparedness, and before that time comes I hope they will have a change of heart and be willing to assist those favoring an appropriation for good roads, and by their vote show to the people that they are willing to give them an opportunity to better the conditions in the rural communities of the United States.

Every man on the floor of this House must depend upon the products of the farm, and the cheaper you can bring these products to the door of the consumer the better off we will all be. Therefore it seems to me that the pending bill now under consideration is the wisest piece of legislation we have had before us for some time, and I wonder why the Government of the United States has neglected this proposition for such a great number of years, as it has been assisting every other enterprise, as I will show before I conclude my remarks, but so far has overlooked the construction of dirt roads in rural communities. This Government has constructed roads in our Territorial and insular possessions and has expended millions in constructing roads and trails in Alaska. It has expended great sums in the Canal Zone, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, and we have now reached the point where we should assist the people at home by extending aid in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads, which are now established and used by the Government under the supervision of the Post Office Department for the carrying of mail. This aid will have a direct effect of benefiting all those who reside in the rural communities in the way of providing a means for the farmer to get his products to market, and those residing in the cities and towns will have the benefit of getting the products delivered to their doors daily.

The United States is the only progressive Nation in the world that has not given great consideration to the construction of its highways and the improvement of its internal traffic. All of the progressive nations of Europe are giving national aid to their highways, while this Government has neglected to extend aid, and has thereby imposed a burden of millions of dollars annually on our producers. Quite a different condition exists in the countries of Europe. There a splendid system of roads has been inaugurated. During the days of Napoleon, following the example set by the Roman Empire, an extensive system of road building was established throughout France, and many millions of dollars are expended yearly by that Government in the construction and maintenance of their roads.

The improvement of our inland highways by our Government not only cheapens the necessities of life but furnishes employment for many thousand of laborers who need the work. The farming population of this country constitutes about 35 per cent of the total population of the United States, and it is unfair to expect this large per cent to construct, unaided, the highways of this country. They should not be required to construct the roads over which they must haul their product to the consumer; at least the consumer should be required to contribute his share of the expense, as he receives as great a benefit as the farmer. All must admit that the farmer is the real producer of the Nation, and all must admit that he creates the wealth of the Nation, which largely finds its way into the pockets of other people, yet the producer has been required, unaided, to maintain and construct his roads over which he travels to the commercial centers of the United States.

Anyone who desires to be fair, even though he may reside in a city, will concede that there is no unfairness or unjustness in an appropriation by the Government to construct and maintain highways, and I rejoice to see the Members of this House who reside in city districts giving their aid to this bill. It shows conclusively that the city Members are patriotic and fair-minded business men and view this question in an economical way, and they realize all must be benefited by this appropriation. At no time in the history of our Government has there been as close relation between the people on the farms and the people in the cities. The rural mail routes and the rural telephone has done much to bring the country and city together, and the effect of this bill, should it become a law, will result largely in causing the young men and young women of the country to remain at home, as they will have all the advantages of the city life and at the same time enjoy the free out of doors and pure open air. At this time the high cost of living renders it important that we should seriously consider the question of transportation, and we should do all in our power to bring the cost of transportation to the lowest minimum. Transportation is now a paramount question. All civilized countries of the world have progressed rapidly along this line, and the great change made in the last decade is wonderful.

We have but three methods of transportation, viz, water navigation, railroads, and wagon roads. Each of the three depend largely upon the other. The railroad can not exist without the aid of the wagon road, and neither the wagon road or the railroad can properly perform their functions of upbuilding a nation without water transportation. Each of these methods has an important duty to perform, not only in the local community, but in an interstate and foreign commerce. Two of these methods of transportation are owned and controlled largely by private corporations and are operated for gain. The third method, or the wagon-road transportation, is controlled by the State and is free to all of its citizens.

Our Government imposes a duty on many articles of life, an internal revenue and corporation tax, which, in all respects, places an additional cost upon the articles and fixes a charge on the article by the corporation paying the tax. All of our citizens are taxed in one way or the other and proportionately to the amount they purchase and consume.

The railroads of the United States have grown in magnitude and efficiency until we have perfected the greatest railroad system in the world. Our navigable streams and Great Lakes are crowded with vessels large and small, all engaged in interstate traffic. Rivers and harbors are provided for annually by our Government, and large appropriations are made yearly for their improvement; and we also make large appropriations annually for the construction of public buildings throughout the United States. In the past our Government has donated millions of acres of land as a subsidy to railroad companies to induce them to construct railroads, yet practically nothing has been done for the improvement of dirt roads or national highways. We have to-day in the United States daily Rural Delivery Service, which traverses about 42,000 miles of different highways of the Nation, coming in daily contact with more than 20,000,000 people living in the rural districts. I do not anticipate that anyone will seriously oppose the passage of this bill in the House, but if they should do so, I desire to invite their attention to the fact heretofore mentioned that in the early construction of railroads throughout the United States land was donated to the railroads as an inducement to the corporations to construct their lines, at an estimated value now of more than $1,000,000,000. There has been appropriated for rivers and harbors since 1875, $592,395,000; for the building of levees alone to June, 1902, $16,582,000; for the construction of public buildings up to June, 1911, $213,376,000. Again, we have expended nearly $400,000,000 on the Panama Canal; for the construction of roads in Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, and the Territory of Alaska, $8,300,000.

The United States now has an estimated mileage of rural roads and highways amounting to 2,199,645, of which only 190,769 miles are improved. When you mention the number of miles of highways in the United States those who are disposed to oppose an appropriation for the improvement of rural roads may suggest that it would bankrupt the Government if we undertook to lend aid to the States in the improvement of roads; but it is estimated by the Office of Public Roads that 90 per cent of the traffic is confined to less than 30 per cent of the roads, and that the improvement of 440,000 miles of public roads would practically satisfy the demands of the country. If this estimate of the Office of Public Roads is correct, the improvement of our rural roads is not an undertaking so gigantic as one would suppose; at least, it is not as great an appropriation as Federal pensions and the maintaining of our Army and Navy, nor would the appropriation reach a sum as great as was added to the Federal pension rolls a few days ago, which passed the House without any serious objection; and in that connection I might say that I was heartily in favor of the recent pension bill and supported it, because I believe it to be right and believe the Government should look to the protection and convenience of those who fought for it in time of war, keeping in mind all the time the merit and efficiency necessary to maintain the Government.

I now think the time has come when we should consider the interest of those who live in the rural communities and provide for the improvement of our internal highways, so that those living in the rural district may reap as great benefit from the Government as those living in cities, on railroads, and navigable streams.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1910 discloses that the tariff revenue aggregated $331,683,445; and the Government census of 1910 shows that we have 18,400,000 families in the United States. If you will apportion this tariff revenue among the families of the United States, each family is entitled to $18.13. The report of the Interstate Commerce Commission of the gross earnings of the railroads for the same period shows an aggregate of $2,787,266,136. Divide this amount by the number of families in the United States and you will find that each family paid a tax to the railroads for transportation of $151.48. The total amount of freight handled by the railroads for the fiscal years 1906 and 1907 was 1,100,000,000 tons. It is estimated that at least one-half of this tonnage was hauled to and from the railroad by wagons, and it would be fair to estimate that as much as one-third more was hauled to the consumer by wagons, on what may be termed a "second hauling," making a total of 800,000,000 tons hauled by wagons. In addition to this, a large bulk of the cotton crop, which amounts to practically 3,000,000 tons annually, is hauled from the farm to the gin, thence back to the farm, and finally to the railroad or to water navigation. It should also be stated that large quantities of agricultural, forest, and miscellaneous products are first hauled in their crude state over the rural roads before they reach the railroads and waterways, thus necessitating a rehauling of these products. So it is perfectly fair to estimate that the per capita transportation tax on the people of this country amounts to $53.37, as against a tariff tax of $18.13.

It is estimated by Mr. Page, the director of the Office of Public Roads, who is an expert on road building and wagon transportation, after a careful study of the question, that the cost of wagon transportation over the improved roads of England, Germany, and France by wagon is only 10 cents per ton per mile, but eliminating any doubt as to the cost in these countries of transportaing a ton a mile by wagon we will say that it amounts to 12½ cents per ton. If by the construction of good roads in this country we can reduce the cost of wagon transportation from 25 cents per ton per mile, which it now costs, to 12½ cents per ton per mile, we will save the people of our country on this item alone, at the very least calculation, $500,000,000 yearly.

Investigation shows that the cost to the American farmer is about 1.6 cents more to haul a bushel of wheat a distance of 9.4 miles from his farm to the neighboring railroads than it does to ship from New York to Liverpool, a distance of 3,100 miles. If we had a system of good roads throughout the country, the farmers would save in the cost of wagon transportation of the cotton crop yearly $5,076,183; of the wheat crop, $10,256,058; of the corn crop, $12,709,278; whereas it now costs for wagon transportation to get these three great crops to market twice this sum.

The question of reduction in the cost of getting the crops to market is not the only benefit to be derived from good roads throughout the rural districts, because statistics show that good roads in a community adds from $2 to $10 per acre to the land value, and the total area of farm lands in the United States in 1900 was shown to be about 850,000,000 acres, an estimated increase of $5 per acre. If such an amount should be added to the value of the land by the construction of good roads, it would enhance the taxable value of the farm lands $4,250,000.

The great disadvantage that now confronts the American farmer is that he must market his crops when the roads are good, and he is not permitted to hold them until the demand is the greatest and the price is the highest. The present condition of rural roads throughout the United States renders it practically impossible to market his crops during the winter months. It matters not what price he is paid, he must market his crops when the roads are passable.

Another great item to be considered in this matter is that the farmer is required to do his hauling when the roads are good, and when the roads are good it is usually pretty weather, and he should be devoting his time in the fields. If good roads are established, the farmer will be permitted to do his hauling when his fields are too wet to work, and thus save him a large amount of time which he would otherwise lose.

For the last few years we have been continuously hearing the cry from every source, "Back to the farm." The intelligent boys and girls of our rural districts are seeking to escape the social conditions prevalent in the country during the long, dreary winter months of the year, attributable almost entirely to the bad roads. The drift of our population from the rural districts to the cities is really becoming alarming, yet if we improve the roads we will remedy this condition and largely eliminate this desire to get to the cities. The telephone and rural free delivery has done much to satisfy those who live on the farm, and if we would lend aid in the construction of public roads, instead of the dreary winter months in the rural communities farm life would be more enjoyable and profitable. Bad roads prevent attendance at school and church; they make literary societies, social gatherings, club and lodge meetings practically impossible during the bad weather.

I have had an opportunity to learn personally of the conditions that exist in the rural districts, and have had actual experience and know of the inconveniences that go with country life a distance from the railroads. I was born and reared quite a distance from the railroad, and I know how difficult it is to get to and from the market places over unimproved roads.

Another great benefit to all of the people, regardless of citizenship in any State, which will be derived is the good effect it will have upon the rising generation in the rural communities, and, in my judgment, the improvements of country roads will make country life more pleasant, more enjoyable, and more profitable, and will be the strongest inducement to cause the young boys and girls to remain on the farm, and the question of supply and demand and high price of food products will almost be solved. I feel that within a few generations we will have improved roads throughout the United States, and few, I take it, will prefer the crowded city life to the freedom of outdoors in the country.

Another great benefit to be derived is that it provides better facilities and better opportunities for school and church attendance, and this means, of course, a stronger and better government. If we make a provision for the improvements of roads, it will increase the attendance at schools and churches and will in every way tend to upbuild the intellectual and moral standards of every community in the United States. There is no good reason that can be urged against the passage of this bill. No one who knows anything at all about country life can doubt that internal improvements is one of the best assets a country can have, and this improvement will advance and establish better government, better morals, better citizens, and promote social intercourse. The passage of this bill will materially cause the people in the country and the people in the cities to come closer together.

I want to see the day when every farmer can haul his product to market over good roads, without being forced to drive in mud up to the hub of his wagon. I want to see the day when every farmer can travel with pleasure, the same as the man in the city, who has the advantages of paved streets. It is nothing more than right that we should assist in the improvement of the post roads as provided in this bill.

There is one other advantage to be gained by the passage of this bill which I desire to touch upon, and that is the relief it will extend to the rural mail carriers and the star-route carriers. These men are compelled to expose themselves daily to all kinds of weather. The passage of this bill will lessen their burdens and lessen the wear and tear on their teams and equipment. I want to see the improvement of the post roads for that reason; and, another thing, I want to see the day when these rural mail carriers are given sufficient wages to compensate them for the great amount of labor they are performing. Take into consideration the fact that these carriers are required to expose themselves and perform their duties in season and out of season, and compare that fact with the compensation they are now receiving and I think you will agree with me that they should be paid better wages.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am anxious to see this bill pass and become a law, and I hope that in the future the appropriations may be greatly increased and that the Government will, with the cooperation of the several States in the Union, rapidly construct a system of highways throughout the Nation which will be the best of any Government in the world and, in my judgment, when constructed, will be the greatest asset and the richest legacy which we will leave to posterity as a monument of the wisdom of the legislators of Congress.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

[Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentlemen on the other side to use some of their time.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I voted for the roads bill in the last House reported from the Committee on Roads. I am under the impression that I voted for a roads bill in the Sixty-second Congress, although some one intimated the other day that I did not. I do not know, and it is not material. I never vote for a bill trying to deceive myself as to what it means or what its effect will be. I have no doubt that the General Government will soon be engaged in aiding in the construction of roads throughout the country. And while the bills which have been reported heretofore carried authorization of $25,000,000, no one knows how much will be appropriated in a few years for that purpose. If we commence with an initial appropriation of $25,000,000, and that is successful, it is very likely that the sum will be very largely increased. This bill will undoubtedly pass this House, on the theory that it is in aid of the farmers. Now, I am not going to deceive myself about that proposition. The bill that was passed in the Sixty-second Congress was for the aid of country roads, roads which lead by the farmer's house, roads which are ordinarily not improved very much, and not usually in very good order; roads upon which the farmer really hauls his product a few miles to market; and perhaps my view of the subject may not be as broad or as informing as the views of others, because I live in a State and was raised in a portion of a State where no farmer hauls his produce many miles to market. We have a railroad every few miles in the State of Illinois. The farmers do not now, as they did when Illinois was first settled, have to haul their wheat 50 to 150 miles over a country road to market. He now hauls his grain a short distance to a car, or a warehouse, or a railroad.

That may not be the case entirely throughout the country, and is not, and there might be some reason—and there is—for the improvement of roads in order to aid the farmer to haul his crops or his produce to market; and yet in the main the products of all farms are carried to the real market by water or by rail—principally by rail.

But the theory of the first bill was to aid these country roads. There was quite a dramatic fight in the House between those who believed in aiding the country roads on the one side and those who were more or less susceptible to the influences of the automobile associations on the other side.

In the last Congress the bill was on a 50-50 plan. It gave authority to aid in the construction of the small or less improved country roads or the roads that the automobile people want. This bill is purely for the purpose of building automobile roads. Farmers will receive incidental benefit, but the highway commissioners of the various States in the main have been created through influences emanating from the manufacturers of automobiles.

Now, I do not say that it is not a good thing to build good roads in order that people may travel by automobiles, or that that may not be in the interest of the farmers, because in some of the States—and I hope it may be true as to most of them—the farmers are not behindhand at all in the owning or using of automobiles.

But I am not going to vote for this bill at this time for this reason: I believe the Government can well afford, when it has the money, to appropriate it in aid of the construction of roads, whether they be through routes mainly used by automobiles or local routes mainly used by farmers for local work. But I do not believe that the General Government ought to levy special taxes upon a few for the purpose of constructing roads or beginning the construction of roads. We propose here an expenditure of $25,000,000 a year. That is just a little less than the special stamp taxes amount to. For the last fiscal year, when the emergency tax law was enforced for a little less than three-quarters of a year, the collection for stamp taxes under Schedules A and B of the law amounted to about $23,500,000. For the first quarter of this fiscal year those stamp taxes amounted to about $8,500,000, a little more than the amount that it is proposed shall be appropriated for the construction of roads.

I am not willing that the General Government shall levy special taxes in order to go into the business of providing roads. If we can raise the money, as we frequently have been able to, and probably will be able to in the future, in the general course of our revenue laws, and have a surplus which we can devote to the construction of roads, well and good. I do not vote against the bill because my own locality will not receive direct benefit from it, but for the reason that I doubt whether the country, where the money is expended, outside of the cities, is really any more benefited than the cities, where the money is not expended, even if it were for the construction of purely farmers' roads. The cities are prosperous only when the farmers are prosperous; the cities will do well and the men who live in the cities make money only when the country is prosperous and when those who raise the produce on the farms are prosperous. But I am not willing to levy special taxes against the cities in an odious form, such as the stamp taxes are, for the purpose of spending money which is not required for immediate expenditure, either in the cities or in the country.

I am not sure that the statement which I make will not bring adherents to the bill. I notice that the taxes collected under Schedules A and B of the emergency-revenue act, which is for documentary stamps, stamps on perfumery, cosmetics, and so forth, for the last fiscal year in the State of Alabama were $183,000; in the State of Arkansas, $117,000; in the first district of Illinois, which is Chicago, $2,480,000; in the State of Florida, $140,000; in the third Massachusetts, which is Boston, $1,004,000; in the second New York district, which is New York City, $4,354,000; in the first Pennsylvania, which is Philadelphia, $809,000; in South Carolina, $100,000; in Washington, $174,000; in North and South Dakota combined, $223,000. And I might go on with the list. These special taxes which we have levied are paid by a few cities as stamp taxes—an odious form of taxation at best. I am not undertaking to criticize the necessity of levying this tax at this time, but it is an odious form of taxation at the best, which weighs very heavily upon those who pay it, and which in most instances can not be passed on or divided up among the people generally.

Now, the Members of Congress from those parts of the country where these taxes are very small are in a vast majority in this House. They have the power, and they are about to exercise it, to take this money which they have levied upon the cities in an odious form and expend it in their own States and in their own communities. In the long run that method of raising revenue and expending money will not be a success. You levy the general taxes throughout the country on any proposition; the cities, in the first instance, pay the most of it. They do not complain. They understand the situation. Where the wealth is mostly gathered, there taxation necessarily will be, and must be, the heaviest. They do not complain when you take the money raised in the form of general taxation and expend it in particular localities where it may be of benefit, especially to the locality, and indirectly to the mass of citizenship throughout the Union. But they will have the right to complain when you tax special industries by stamp taxes for the purpose of raising money to be expended in particular localities, and so long as we have the stamp tax in effect, bearing heavily, a burden upon a few people, I am unwilling to take that money and vote it for the benefit of perhaps a majority in particular localities.

I know that probably that statement will only add to the votes for the bill, because it is very natural, though somewhat regrettable, that Members of Congress, human as they are, are more prone to vote for money to be expended in their district which they know their districts do not raise in the form of revenue. And yet the Government must always in the long run be fair to all. I do not think there is that necessity for this legislation at this time to justify the Government inaugurating a system of spending money for local improvements, and raising that money by an odious form of stamp taxation. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I have always been for good roads. Away back in 1904 it was my pleasure to vote in the Legislature of Maryland for the construction of one of the earliest and best roads in this section, that leading from Washington to Baltimore.

In 1906 we established a system of good roads, and since that time we have constructed in Maryland roads costing more than $15,000,000. Every section of our State is connected with every other section by trunk-line roads, and they are of great benefit not only to the cities but to the various sections of the State.

I come from a district entirely within the city of Baltimore, but I have never yet heard one of our people complain about the expenditure of money upon good roads in the State of Maryland. It has brought to us prosperity, it has brought close to the city of Baltimore every section of the State from the Potomac River to the Pennsylvania line, from the shores of the great Atlantic Ocean to the Alleghany Mountains, so that every section is connected by easy roads, and the farmers are using them to a great extent in bringing their goods to the markets of Baltimore.

I believe that whatever makes the counties of the State prosperous is bound to make the cities with which they trade likewise both prosperous and progressive, and upon that theory we have gone ahead in the construction of good roads throughout the State of Maryland.

We have a secondary system, which reaches the small road, or the road leading to the farmer's home. Under that system the counties are able to contribute one-half and the State the other half. By those two methods the State of Maryland has acquired a road system second to none in the United States, and we believe every dollar expended has been well expended; that it has brought great revenue to the State; that the properties along those roads have increased wonderfully in value; that the people from the towns and cities are going into the country, living on these highways, where they can easily reach the city of Baltimore or the other sections of the State to which they desire to go.

So I say I have always been in favor of good roads, though I represent an entirely city district. I believe no money the Government can expend can be better expended than upon the public highways of this great country. We ought not to consider whether we live in a particular city or a particular State, but whatever is beneficial to the great mass of the people of this country is bound to be beneficial to each and every section of the country. [Applause.]

When you realize that there are about 6,500,000 farmers in the United States and, including women and children, about 45,000,000 depending upon them, we can readily see the importance of such a bill as this to that vast population of the United States.

It costs 25 cents per ton-mile to transport farm products to the market in the United States where the roads are bad, while in continental Europe, where they have good roads, it costs but 8 cents per ton-mile, a loss to the farmer and his family of 17 cents per ton-mile.

The railroads of our country carry each year some 900,000,000 tons of freight, about 200,000,000 tons of which is transported over the country roads to the markets, wharves, or stations by the farmers, from which it can readily be seen the enormous loss to the farming population of the country by reason of the bad roads which we now have.

I can not better express my position upon the importance of good roads than to recite the facts I gave to this House two years ago upon a similar bill:

I have seen farmers haul their products to market on both pikes and dirt roads. On the average pike one team will haul from one and a half to two tons, make an average trip of 20 miles, and return in one day. On the dirt roads one team will haul, on an average, from one-half to three-fourths of a ton, make an average trip of 10 miles, and return in one day. Therefore, on this calculation, which is a fair one, it costs the man on the dirt road four times what it costs the man on the pike to market his products, which is conclusive proof that the mud tax is the greatest, most excessive, and most burdensome tax that the farmer pays, and as it is a well-known fact that the ultimate consumer bears all the burden this mud tax must eventually be paid by him. So in view of the fact that the life of the Nation is dependent upon the success of the farm, will any man contend that it is not economical and profitable for the Government to expend money in the construction and maintenance of roads into and through the farming sections? The man who would make such contention is ignorant of the interest the city has, or should have, in the success of the farm.

We have been told that our great cities are merely the product of our agricultural resources. The factories change the products of field and forest to articles for the comfort of man. The progress and prosperity of our land stand upon the innumerable acres of the Union, and the great farm products produced upon this vast acreage is the great backbone of all common wealth and enterprise. Good roads reduce the cost of transportation from at least 28 cents per ton-mile to 8 cents. The experience has been that where good roads are constructed property is increased in value. The taxable basis of the State is increased, the result being a great benefit to the producer, the miner, and the taxpayer. We can not separate the interests of those of the city who earn their living by labor and manufacture from those of the country who produce the wherewithal upon which they live. We can not improve our roads without lessening the expense of transportation of the farm, and this lessened expense will eventually lessen the cost to the ultimate consumer. So with each and all of us, whether residents of teeming cities or of the country districts, good roads are of inestimable value.

Better roads mean cheaper transportation; cheaper transportation means cheaper foodstuffs and living. The farmer feeds the people. What benefits the farmer benefits those who work in the factory, the shops, the thousands and tens of thousands who live in towns and cities. Why improve the rivers and harbors and not improve the great highways of the land over which must be transported the wheat, the corn, the cotton, the cattle and hogs, and every article we eat and wear? The Government collects its revenue from all of the people and all of the people should receive the same fair consideration in return.

There is also another phase of the subject which I think is of vast importance to the people of our State. That is the "educational benefits" derived from good roads. I have always believed, from the time when I was a public-school teacher in my native State, that better advantages can be obtained by having large graded schools; and by the assistance of good roads we may be able to organize the several public schools into groups and merge these groups into central schools. The good roads will enable us to have well-equipped wagons, or perhaps motor vehicles, by which to convey the children from their several sections to the central school. In this way the country people will get the same advantages as those the city now enjoy. This system would insure the regular attendance of the children and their continued interest in the school and would, no doubt, prove a marvelous success in their education. I believe that the education of the children of the country districts is just as important to the people of Baltimore and other large cities as any other one thing, because it is a well-known fact that many of the country children become inhabitants of the large cities and take an active part in the general welfare and the industrial pursuits and professions of their adopted home.

Mr. Chairman, for the reasons which I have assigned, and many more which could be given in support of this bill had I more time at my disposal, I shall vote for the pending bill for the improvement of the roads of the country, and sincerely hope it may pass the House and the Senate and become one of the great constructive laws of our land.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PRICE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that no question before the country to-day meets with such universal approval and support as the question of good roads. Especially true in the country districts of the Nation, because it means, perhaps, more to our rural population than others, being isolated in many instances and long distances from the large cities and centers of population. The interest in good roads, however, is not confined to rural communities by any means, for in this day of automobiles and rapid transit the city resident is as vitally interested as any other. I think, then, that the desirability and the need of good roads need hardly be discussed, for it is universally recognized and conceded, the only question being as to who shall build them and the method to be employed in their construction and maintenance. So insistent has the demand become for improved roads that all the States of the Union, with the exception of five, have instituted special highway departments in their State governments, and many of our States have in recent years appropriated vast sums of money for improved roads, and I know that our people are willing to be taxed for these improvements, because they receive, perhaps, more real benefit from them than any other public utility. The time was when it was thought by many to be unconstitutional for the Federal Government to appropriate money for roads in the States, but in this day it is very generally conceded that it may do so without violence to the Constitution.

Congress appropriates money every year to projects more questionable, constitutionally considered. Not being a member of the legal fraternity, I would not presume to discuss this feature of the pending bill; but common sense would dictate that if the Federal Government can establish a post office in a State and a rural mail route from that post office, or contract for the carrying of the mails by star route from given points in a State, it may with equal propriety contribute to the building and maintenance of roads over which the mails are carried. I agree fully with the report of the committee that—

> Roads are local concerns, and primarily it is the duty of the States to provide them for the people.

I also believe jurisdiction over the roads should belong to the State and should never be undertaken by the General Government.

The delivery of mail is a function of the Federal Government, and a road over which the mail is carried is just as much a postal facility as is the post office where the mail is distributed or the carrier on the route. An adequate office outfit, a competent carrier, and a good road contribute alike to the proper and quick dispatch of the mail; hence a contribution by the General Government to the States for the betterment of the road over which it exercises the postal functions should not be considered radical but an aid in the service it is attempting to render the public. The General Government renders aid to State institutions of learning where military training is given for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of our military service. It likewise extends aid to agricultural colleges in the States where military training is given in order to increase the efficiency of our educated farmers. It spends vast sums on rivers and harbors in the interest of commerce and navigation and in order that our Navy may better protect us. We appropriate millions of dollars annually for public buildings in order that the people's busineses may be expedited. If, then, we can appropriate such vast sums for these purposes, some of which only a part of the people are interested in, why should we not appropriate money for roads in which all the people are interested? If deepening a waterway is a saving to the public in freight rates and an aid in transportation, why is not the building of a road, which likewise is an aid to transportation and a cheapening of rates, also a public benefit worthy of Government aid? Our Government has expended millions of dollars in building post-office buildings in our large towns and cities. Why should we not spend millions more in building post roads? The reason for both expenditures would be the same, namely, the efficiency of the Postal Service.

But some gentlemen have obejcted to governmental aid because it is proposed to appropriate money without assuming jurisdiction, as is exercised in some of the appropriations I have mentioned. But that need not disturb us, for we are in part only reimbursing the State for some of the money it has expended in building roads which we are using in common with them for increasing the efficiency of the Postal Service. We do not need jurisdiction, as we demand in many other things, because we contribute only a part, and our contribution is made to an organized department of a State government having as much or more invested than we have and made under such restrictions as precludes the possibility of governmental waste.

The maximum amount that may be appropriated under this bill is twenty-five millions annually, certainly not a large amount for an object so worthy, when compared with appropriations for purposes less meritorious and with propositions which do not begin to compare in public benefit. As to the equity in allotment to the several States there is great diversity of opinion. I do not suppose it is perfect in its application. It would be beyond the possibilities of human wisdom to draft a measure that would be considered entirely equitable, but I believe the committee has come as near as it is possible at this time. This is a great country of ours, made up of a Union of great States, some of them large in area but comparatively small in population, some small in area and large in population, but all great, whether large or small. Our interests are diversified. Our conditions are different. Some States have large cities, some are almost rural. Some present difficulties of one kind in road building, some another, so that a bill which would be absolutely equitable and free of arbitrary features would be impossible of preparation. But I believe the committee has done well. There are three methods of allotment to the States, first, an arbitrary amount of $65,000 is given to each State, large or small, and one-half the remainder to be apportioned in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the population of all the States, and the other half in the ratio which the mileage of rural free delivery and star routes bears to the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes of all the States. I do not know whether a more equitable plan could be evolved or not, anyway none has been proposed, and I will say this, that I am in favor of this bill, but if some gentleman who is opposing this measure will propose a better plan I will be glad to help adopt it. I am not wedded to the letter of this bill, but I am in hearty accord with the spirit of it. Until a better plan is suggested I shall stand by this. This bill is of so much importance to all the American people that we should not haggle about and split hairs over entire equity. The belief that some States will get a few thousand more and some a few thousand less than they are entitled to should not jeopardize the passage of a bill so far-reaching and beneficial. It is seldom that we have the opportunity to pass legislation so universally helpful as this bill will prove to be. There should be no sectionalism because all sections are helped. There should be no city against country, because you can not benefit the farmer without benefiting the city man as well.

In the State of Maryland, which I have the honor in part to represent, we have been operating under a law similar to this for many years. The State gives aid to the counties under certain conditions, and it has stimulated road building as nothing had done before, resulting finally in the bonding of our State and constructing a complete system of State highways. Although a small State we have spent over $16,000,000 in the last seven years and have some of the best roads in the Union. All of this was the result of the impetus given road improvement by the passage of the State aid law, whereby the State contributed 50 per cent to the counties. The law is still in effect, and at the last legislature the appropriation was increased from two to three hundred thousand dollars annually. While the State has constructed outright the intercounty system of 1,300 miles, the counties are constructing with State aid the lateral roads leading from the State highway into the surrounding country. It has been argued here that this bill, if enacted into law, would stagnate road building and place a premium upon inactivity. My experience teaches me otherwise, and it is my earnest conviction that if you pass this bill and make it a law you will have placed a stimulus before the American States for road construction they have never before possessed. During the passage of our road legislation through the various legislative sessions in Maryland we were confronted with the same issues that confront us here. The great city of Baltimore, our only large city, felt they were being called upon to pay more than her share of the cost of our State roads, but I venture to say that to-day there is not a handful of her citizens that regret contributing to the construction of a great State system of roads; the city has reaped her share of the benefits. In the last analysis all roads lead to the great cities and centers of population, and the interests and destinies of all our people are so interwoven, whether city or country, that all are equally benefitted.

Another argument made against this bill is that on account of special appropriations for national defense which this Congress is called upon to provide we can not afford to embark on road improvement. Why, it is a part of national defense! What better investment can we make than in spending a few millions to improve our roads for military movements? Of what use would a vast army be, no matter how well trained and disciplined, unless they could be quickly moved to the field of battle? It would be far more sensible, as a matter of defense and preparedness, to have a few less regiments of soldiers and better roads over which to move the remainder.

Another objection urged against this bill is the broad powers given the Secretary of Agriculture in administration, but I believe a close study of its provisions, taking into consideration the ends to be attained, will convince most of us that they are not dangerous powers, but wise provisions. For instance, he may in his discretion contribute on the part of the Government not less than 30 nor more than 50 per cent of the reasonable cost of such construction or maintenance. I admit these are broad powers for Congress to invest in an administrative office, but the peculiarity of the project, I believe, makes it a necessity. Conditions in one State might make it desirable to construct more miles of road with Government aid than in some other State, in which case 30 per cent could be furnished, while the State in which conditions warranted the building of less miles could be allotted 40 or 50 per cent. I believe if you take into consideration the advanced position of some States over others in road construction as well as the geographical conditions and the geological conditions of the various States we must conclude this is a wise if not a necessary provision. It is possible, of course, to abuse this power; but what power of administration is not susceptible of abuse? As for myself, I have no fear on that score either from the present incumbent or his successors. Another thing that must be borne in mind is that while the percentage may vary, the allotment to the several States may not be changed, so that a State will be sure of its allotment being expended either with a greater or less amount of its own funds. The third purpose for which it is conceded the Federal Government may aid the construction of roads is where the roads are used in the transportation of interstate commerce. The question of transportation in a vast country like ours is second to none, and the ease with which it is consummated and the lowest cost of service are vital questions. The great difference in the cost of transportation between the farm and the railroad with improved roads is apparent to all, when we consider the figures in connection with it. It has been estimated that it costs the farmer 25 to 30 cents per ton per mile to haul his products to the railroad, while the railroad company takes it to the city market, 150 miles distant, for one-half cent per ton per mile. Much criticism has been leveled at the railroads of the country in recent years, some of it deserved, but with such figures as these before us it is difficult to charge much of the high cost of living to the railroads. In the question of transportation alone the investment this country would make by this bill would be more than justified, and the millions thus spent would flow back into the pockets of the people manyfold. By this saving in transportation that I have indicated every man, woman, and child in the Union is affected.

France has the greatest road system of any nation in the world, having nearly a half million miles of macadam roads, constructed in part by national aid, and the products of factory and farm are carried to the markets for less than 10 cents per ton per mile, as against about 30 in the United States. Do you comprehend what a vast saving that would be to our people? Is it not easy to see what a factor that would be in reducing the cost of living in this country? It would benefit all classes—the laborer, the mechanic, the banker, the merchant, and the farmer. The farmers of the Nation are more vitally interested, perhaps, than any other, because it means more in the way of conveniences. It makes life on the farm attractive; it increases the use of automobiles by the farmers; it keeps the boys and girls on the farms, which are the great feeders of the Nation. The farm is the source of our national wealth, the foundation of civilized society, the best home of the family; it is the recruiting ground for our cities, and it is from the farmers that the great men in commerce and finance are recruited and from whence reinforcements come to replenish the forces in public life in both State and Nation. This is neither a sectional nor partisan measure, but should be met in a patriotic spirit.

The American people are as a rule patriots first, partisans second, and I believe all that is necessary to the passage of this legislation is that a clear understanding be gained as to the untold and undreamed of possibilities. I will give you an illustration from my own State: Our State road project was begun under a Democratic governor, a Democratic legislature, and a Democratic roads commission. In the midst of it, and after we were fairly started and had spent six millions, we were so unfortunate as to elect a Republican governor, who, in turn, appointed a Republican roads commission, but the legislature remained strongly Democratic. Many feared that party conflict and a divided responsibility would prove disastrous to our State road system, but there seemed a determination that party politics and jealousies should have no place in this matter. Accordingly, we find a Democratic legislature appropriating in two sessions over $10,000,000 to complete the roads, and we find the Republican road commission vieing with the Democrats by spending it judiciously and expeditiously. I commend that spirit to the Members of this House. Let us rise to the occasion, brushing aside all speciousness, and give this great people whom we represent their hearts' desire. If we think we can not afford it, let us cut off something else and make ourselves afford it. If you think some particular State is to get ten thousand more than it should, forget it, and try to remember that we can not benefit any State or section without benefiting every other State and section of our common country. We are Americans, and we are here to legislate for all the American people. Let us aid in the construction of a great system of roads that shall reach from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf. Establish a public utility that is desired and used by all the people all the time. The automobilest on pleasure and recreation bent wants improved roads, and as he traverses this country and sees its greatness his love for it is bound to increase. The commerce will be carried over them with immense profit and benefit. The artisan and the laborer, with their dinner pails hung to the handle bars of a bicycle, will rejoice and bless the country in which they live. The farmer and his family will be more prosperous and happy, and the Government, which has made a comparatively small contribution, will move its troops quickly, deliver the mails with greater expedition, and see the products of the farm placed at the door of the consumer at a reduced cost. Are not all these desirable ends worth striving for; and that such results will be attained is, I believe, the opinion of the great mass of the American people.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is unduly alarmed, I am sure, if he is under the impression, as he seems to be, that the rural sections of the country, or the farmers, as he puts it, are going to have an advantage in this bill over the cities. There is a general demand for good roads, and my observation has been that the greatest demand for road development comes largely from the city centers, in order that the cities might be brought more closely in touch with the rural sections.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], one of the ablest Members of this House, together with other distinguished gentlemen, have seen fit to criticize this bill. Admitting that it is not all that some of us would like, for I would like to see a bill carrying a larger appropriation for the purpose of road construction, yet it is the plan the committee has agreed upon, and it is the only plan now before Congress and I am heartily in favor of it.

On December 7, 1915, in the opening days of the present Congress, I introduced a bill having as its purpose governmental aid to road construction, which bill is No. 3060, and was referred to the Committee on Roads. That in a large measure expressed my idea of how the Government should contribute toward this important development. The present bill in some respects has provisions similar to those contained in my bill, but in other respects it is dissimilar. I shall not stop now to read my bill, as it is not under consideration, but I shall discuss the Shackleford bill, which is now under consideration.

CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.

Some gentlemen have opposed and are opposing the idea of Government aid to road building upon the ground that it is not constitutional. There can be but little doubt in the mind of any one well versed upon the questions of constitutional law as to this issue. It is now pretty well and generally conceded that the General Government has the constitutional right to construct and maintain post roads, military roads, and roads used for interstate commerce. As has been so aptly said by the committee:

> On the general principle that the greater contains the lesser, it follows that the General Government may aid the States in the construction and maintenance of such roads.

And that is exactly what the Shackleford bill seeks to do.

OTHER QUESTIONS.

With the constitutional question out of the way, what other opposition have we? It has been urged from certain quarters that this would build roads in the country counties largely at the expense of the great cities, and that the cities pay the larger part of the revenues into the Treasury of the United States. Cities are built, as will be admitted by all, at the expense of the rural sections; and, furthermore, good roads would benefit everybody alike, and would help in bringing the people of the rural sections into closer touch and fellowship with their city brethren, and would prove of inestimable value to farmers and city people alike. It is a narrow policy to argue that money appropriated under this bill would benefit the farming population to the disadvantage of the city population. As I have already said, in my section the people in the cities are eager for better roads that they may be brought more closely in fellowship, commercially, socially, and otherwise, with the people on the farms and with many good towns scattered through the rural sections. The people of the cities are more able and I may add, in my opinion, are willing to bear the greater burden of the expense in order that this great work might be advanced, and in order that the whole country might be bound together in closer bonds of union by means of a network of improved roads

In many sections of the country there are small counties, with limited population and limited means, which are not able to improve and maintain their roads, and yet there can be no system of good roads until they are linked and connected from one county to another; nor can the farmers or people generally get the best use of the roads until the highways of the country are generally improved. If roads are constructed for use of the farmers and if they are good roads, they may be used for any and every other purpose; while on the other hand, if they are constructed for automobiles and are good roads, it naturally follows that the farmers will get the use of them for their various purposes. What the people want are good roads for all purposes, and they want them, as this bill fixes it, under State control.

FEDERAL AID.

I am no new convert to the idea of Federal aid to road construction and road maintenance. I have advocated it for years, in fact, before I began my service in Congress, and voted for and advocated Federal aid to road building when the question was before Congress in the last term. The House, as it will be recalled, passed a bill giving Federal aid to road construction and it was killed in the Senate, and did not, for that reason, become a law. Roads are local in their nature yet national in their importance, if they are improved roads; and national in their detriment to the general good if they are not improved. Primarily it should be the duty of the States to build and maintain the roads, but whose function is it to operate and maintain the mail facilities of the country? All admit that the latter is the function of the National Government; that being true, it is proper that the General Government should provide itself with adequate facilities with which to perform this important duty. The General Government provides other necessaries along this line for adequate mail facilities, such as postmasters, post offices, and so forth, so why not post roads? It also pays heavily for rental or carrying when the mails are conveyed over railroads; why not pay for carrying mails over State roads or help build and maintain those roads? A post road is as much a postal facility as is a mail car or a post office. In many sections post-office buildings are rented instead of owned by the General Government, as it is economy to rent rather than build them in thinly settled sections. The theory is identical—why not the Government pay a reasonable rental for the use of its mail roads, which will go to the construction and upkeep of these and other roads so used by the Government, which would be less expensive than if the Government constructed the roads in the first instance.

In times gone by, I hope never to return, the volume and weight of postal matter were of slight consequence in rural sections. To-day it is considerable in all parts of the country and particularly in the more progressive sections. Formerly the interest of the General Government in the condition of the roads was not very great for the reasons stated, but with the establishment of the Rural Free Delivery Service came also the necessity for better roads over which to transport and deliver the mails. With the Post Office Department's progressive idea of motorizing the rural service came a further demand for still better roads.

In the first place a community can not have the very best possible mail service even with a horse-drawn vehicle equipment unless the roads are fairly improved. The Government will not establish, nor attempt to establish, a rural route unless the roads are passable and unless it is evident that the mails can be delivered over them. Now, under the new or progressive idea originated by the present administration of affairs in the department, a motor route will not be established unless the roads are sufficiently improved for the use of automobiles. With the rapidly expanding Parcel Post System came a further demand for better service, and to get better service there is a general interest in and a demand for better roads. As a result of the demand of the people for efficient mail service on the rural routes and with the Government's faith pledged to better mail service, its interest in good roads has grown accordingly and to-day is a matter of large concern to the Government.

STATE CONTROL.

In the bill providing for Government aid, introduced by me, it is provided that the States shall exercise control over the roads, even though built or maintained by the General Government. This is upon the theory that roads are primarily local concerns over which the respective States exercise control, and that control should not be disturbed by the General Government.

WHAT THE STATES WILL RECEIVE.

This bill in many particulars is the same as the bill we had up and passed in the House in the Sixty-third Congress; and the maximum amount which may be appropriated for any fiscal year under this act is $25,000,000, which would be prorated to each of the several States, as follows:

State.	Population.			Rural free delivery.		Star routes.		Per cent of total miles of R. F. D. and star routes.	Amount.	Specific amount.	Total amount of aid to each State.
	Population.	Per cent of total population.	Amount.	Number of routes.	Aggregate length of routes.	Number of routes.	Aggregate length of routes.

PREPAREDNESS.

We have heard and read a great deal lately on the question of preparedness, and we are told that it is vital to the Nation's safety. I agree that a reasonable and conservative amount of preparedness for an adequate and safe defense should be provided for; but for the life of me I can not see a better plan of preparedness than to improve our highways, both the roads and the waterways. They are both essential to prosperity and to the more substantial development of our great common country. If we would have the sinews of war for defensive purposes, we must keep our country prosperous. To make it prosperous we must aid in its development agriculturally and otherwise, so that the markets of this country and of the world will be open to our products and commerce. Beyond question, prices are most largely controlled by the laws of supply and demand. Unless there are markets there can be no demand, and unless we open up the ways leading to those markets, whether by highways or waterways, the demand may exist, but we can not supply it. This is a great, rich, powerful country. To develop its highways and waterways will not cost a great deal; no one man will ever feel the cost of constructing good roads, and the benefits to the people generally will be simply beyond measure.

I made an address in the last Congress in support of the policy of committing the National Government to aid in road construction and road maintenance, and my position on the subject is well known to every Member of this House and to the country, so I shall not take up much more of your time.

WHAT GEORGIA WOULD GET.

It will be seen from the table I referred to a while ago that the amount coming to Georgia under this bill would be considerable, amounting to $722,494, upon the basis fixed in the table upon which it has been computed. It will be observed that few States of the Union would profit much more largely than would my State. It would mean much to our State if this amount could be added annually to what Georgia is spending and would be of vast assistance in the construction and maintenance of our roads. It would lighten the burdens on Georgia taxpayers to a very great extent and would rapidly help in the completion of a splendid system of highways in our State for the general use of the public. It means a great deal to Georgia and to Georgians.

I hope to see the time when all of Georgia's roads will be improved, so that our farm products and commerce can be hauled and handled at less cost and so that our people from one end of the State to the other will be brought closely together by a network of good roads constructed with Federal aid. No greater work can be undertaken by the General Government; and what it means to Georgia it means to every other Southern State and to practically every other State of the Nation.

The complaint that the expense falls too heavily on the great cities like Philadelphia, New York, and Chicago is not well founded. These are great cities and the country is proud of them; we are all proud of their achievements; but let me assure you that each of the great cities of the country will be correspondingly benefited as the farmers of the country are given better roads. The farmers of the country have contributed all these years to the building of these great American cities, now why not the great cities bear their part of the burden in giving to the farmers of the country a network of improved roads? We must not think of our country as one of sections nor as one of cities and rural sections; we must think of it as one great whole. The interests of the country is so closely interwoven with the interests of the city that they are practically one and the same. It has been said:

Destroy your cities and they will be rebuilt and prosper again, but destroy the farms and grass will grow in the streets of every city in the land.

When you help the agricultural sections of this country, you help every interest in the country. There should not be a dissenting vote against this bill, and I hope it will soon become a law, and that the hope of the people for good roads upon a large and useful scale will soon be realized. It is a question that is close to the heart of the great American people, and they are looking to their friends in Congress to-day to support this bill, which is one of the most beneficial pieces of legislation that has been considered in this House in many a day or will likely be in many a day.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a short article from the Ocala Banner, published in my district on January 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the article referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, the value and importance of good roads as measured by the benefits they confer on all classes of our people, irrespective of their callings or residence, are now so academic and well understood as to render further discussion unnecessary, either to inform or to arouse interest in this great forward and progressive movement.

This Congress more than two years ago recognized the widespread demand for national aid in road building and appointed a committee to thoroughly study the question and to frame a bill for such purpose. The courteous and helpful answers of members of this committee in response to the numerous questions propounded during this discussion show convincingly that they have thoroughly studied the question from every viewpoint and have prepared a bill with an eye single to the common good and one free from all suspicion of partisanship, sectionalism, or selfish greed.

I believe that the passage of this bill will directly benefit more people in every State and in every section of our country than any other one single measure that this or any previous Congress has passed. [Applause.]

The suggestion has been made by one gentleman that this bill is perhaps not as good as the one drafted by this same committee at a previous session, but in such suggestion but few on this floor concur, and the Senate has already repudiated the former bill. It has even been asserted by some of the opponents of this measure that it should be labeled "A bill to provide funds for auto highways." No arguments or facts are advanced in support of such assertion, and I am free to say that if the Members of this House who are supporting this bill believed for a moment that such was its purpose or would be its effect, it would be defeated by an overwhelming vote.

The views on this subject of the distinguished chairman of the committee who drafted and reported the bill, as well as the views of many of his associates on the committee, especially the learned gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], are so well known to the Members of the House and to the public at large as to thoroughly and satisfactorily answer such a suggestion and insinuation. [Applause.]

The very language of the bill controverts it, for, as stated before, the declared primary purpose of this bill is not to construct or maintain good roads from one city to another, nor from one railroad center to another, nor from the Great Lakes to the Gulf, nor from ocean to ocean, but it is to build and maintain a system of roads over which the mail and parcel-post business of this Government can be carried from the local distributing centers in the several States out into the country districts. It is true, however, that when the system of roads contemplated and provided for in this bill is finally completed, that we will have through the connection and meeting of the independent segments that will be constructed at first out from cities and towns a united system of roads interlacing and connecting all the different sections of our country. This, though, must be considered as a secondary or postponed result of the system that we are now inaugurating.

The very fact that the bill provides that the funds to be appropriated shall be disbursed by and under the direction of the head of the Agricultural Department of the Nation is a further assurance that the money will be expended in a way that will best conserve and promote the interest of our great rural districts. This department is appreciative of the fact that good roads are absolutely essential to the furtherance and carrying out of every plan looking to the development, welfare, and growth of the all-important farming interests of our country. This department fully realizes that the men and women who toil with their hands close to old Mother Earth are the chief, yea, the real, wealth makers of this Nation, and that the entire Nation is vitally interested in the perfecting and carrying out of plans that will make farm life attractive, remunerative, and socially satisfying. When our rural life is not as wholesome and not as satisfying as it might be, the whole Nation at large is the loser. [Applause.]

If this Congress can lend its aid in building good roads to the homes of our farmers and will provide at this session a practical rural-credit system, such as has been outlined in what is known as the Bulkley bill, we will have done much for the internal upbuilding of our entire country, and future generations, as well as the present, will be the beneficiaries of this wise and much-needed legislation. Surely we will not distrust the head of our Agricultural Department in the matter of wisely expending, solely in the interest of the farmers, the funds that this bill serves to place at his disposal. As to how well he uses the talents now placed with him will depend all future grants.

In desperation some few who dwell in large cities and are opposed to bills looking to the aid of farmers have suggested that Congress is without power, under the Constitution, to make an appropriation for this purpose, but no one has, and I venture to assert no one can, seriously argue or maintain such position. The bill primarily proposes to aid in the construction and maintenance of a general system of roads leading out from towns, cities, and railroad centers, over which the rapidly increasing business of the Post Office Department can be carried and handled with economy and dispatch. All must admit that when such primary purpose is taken into account these highways lose their local character and become great public and national utilities [applause], over which every day there is and will be transported vast volumes of not only intrastate but also interstate business.

If it be right to appropriate large sums of money to purchase sites and erect thereon magnificent buildings in cities and towns for the prompt and efficient handling of city mail, then it must of necessity follow that it is lawful to use national funds to aid in the building and maintaining of good permanent roads over which the Government can carry on with economy and dispatch its equally important business with the men out on the farms. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

[Mr. WEBB addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will now ask the gentleman from New York to use some of his time.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, in the Sixty-third Congress I regret to state that I voted for the Shackleford roads bill. I was one of those to whom the molasses in the form of an allotment to the State of Massachusetts was of sufficient attraction to catch the fly in the shape of my vote. I am glad to say to-day that I have gotten loose from the molasses and shall act upon this bill upon its merits. Such being the case, I shall record my vote against it.

The report submitted by the committee condemns the bill. Under the heading of "Federal participation" we find it states, "roads are local concerns, and primarily it is the duty of States to provide them for their people." At the beginning of the very next paragraph, in order to be sure that we do not forget the previous paragraph, it states:

> Primarily roads are local concerns, and jurisdiction over them belong to the States and local authorities, which jurisdiction should not be disturbed by the General Government.

I accept the statement of the majority of the committee as the best evidence against the bill. The roads are primarily local concerns, and should be provided by the States and jurisdiction over them should be controlled by the States or the local community. It seems to me we can make no stronger argument against the bill than the committee itself does in its own report. It distinctly states that roads are local in their nature, and it further puts a duty and obligation upon the State to construct them.

Then, again, it admits that no supervision or control of the highway should pass out of the State or local authorities. In other words, this report says that simply because you and I do not do our duty as men and citizens, it is incumbent upon our brother to perform that duty for us. Where is the logic and sense of any such statement as that? It is, however, exactly what the Shackleford report says upon the question of Federal aid to roads.

It says distinctly that it is incumbent upon the State or local community to pay for its own roads for the benefit of the community served, but by inference it says that there are some States in this country which so far have been negligent in their duty in this respect. Rather than arouse them to perform that duty, we will allow them to be as negligent as they desire, and reach into Uncle Sam's pocket to build the roads in order that mail may be delivered.

Then, too, the report says that as rural delivery is a factor in postal management it is right that the Government should pay its part of the expense of the use and maintenance of the highway. Mr. Chairman, what would this proportionate part be, based on a rural carrier going over his route of 25 miles once per day? If a road is used at all, the proportionate share of this light vehicle, whether it be manufactured by the angel of peace or the old-fashioned one-hoss shay or a motor cycle, would be so small that even the gentleman from Missouri could not find enough of an apportionment to base any kind of a payment.

It is admitted that the jurisdiction over highways should not be disturbed by the General Government, but, on the other hand, the supporters of this bill are perfectly willing to permit of all possible kinds of payments by the General Government without the least control of what the money is paid for. All the control the Government is to have is the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, that the specifications are made up in accordance with his views.

That is about as slipshod a business arrangement as I ever knew of even Uncle Sam being willing to participate in. It places in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture as nice a fund for political manipulation as can be possibly established, and opens up a new avenue of political appointment of the highest grade. First we had political places filled by this administration under the collection of the income tax; then another set of officials were established under the Federal reserve; next an additional lot under the war-revenue tax; and now we have a provision that before any of this money is expended the "Secretary of Agriculture shall deduct the sum which he shall deem necessary to defray the expenses of his department in the administration of this act." Still, in the debate on Friday last, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] praises the Democratic Party for having included this splendid piece of legislation in their platform, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] invited all parties to join together in this "nonpartisan" legislation. It probably would be nonpartisan after the Democratic officials deduct all the necessary amounts for defraying the expenses of administration, and then designate what particular friends must be employed in the various States in order to have the specification properly approved.

I appeal to my Republican friends not to be deceived into believing that this is not a nice big slice of Democratic patronage. While I have heard many criticisms on this floor, and a favorite kind of attack in the press, on the river and harbor appropriations, Mr. Chairman, let me remind you that there are six processes of protection to the Treasury before a dollar is ever taken out for rivers and harbors. Here it goes out solely on the say so of the President's political appointee, the Secretary of Agriculture. If river and harbor legislation has in it any slice of "pork," the Shackleford road bill is the whole hog.

I need not refer to the very able argument and splendid speech of my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who is on the committee. I congratulate him on his clear explanation of the fallacies of this legislation, and, further, I desire to inform the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] that he was mistaken in thinking the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] does not know what he is talking about in reference to Massachusetts roads.

We are expending in Massachusetts large sums of money for the construction and maintenance of a highway system, to the use of which we invite the people of the United States. You never have heard of Massachusetts asking the Federal Government for any assistance, nor can you use the molasses of this bill, in the form of an allotment of $535,000, to catch the fly of the support of the Members from that State to pay into the Federal Treasury several times that amount for the benefit of Democratic officeholders or even for the construction of roads in States which have not done their duty in accordance with the phraseology of the Shackleford report in having provided for roads for the people in their own community.

Let me call the attention of the House to section 5, under which you can build any kind of an old road you wish, whether it is of—

Earth, sand-clay, sand-gravel, and other common types of roads, as well as roads of a higher class, one of the purposes of this act being to encourage and promote the improvement of a general system of roads leading from cities, towns, and railway stations into adjacent farming communities.

The committee having stated that it is the duty of the local unit, designated as the State in this bill, to build its own highways, let me remind the friends of this bill that if such roads have not already been constructed leading from the center of population to the farming communities they have neglected their very first duty of construction, because that is exactly the class of road which the local unit should have been anxious to build first. It is true that charity begins at home, and the charity of the State or local community should begin at the depot or post office.

Then, too, the Government will be extremely liberal by the States when it assumes, as it will under section 5, the construction of culverts and bridges. There is no limitation of the size or span that a bridge shall be in order to be constructed by the Federal Government. It is extremely kind of you to allow Massachusetts, New York, and other States we can readily name to have the privilege of paying for the construction of bridges across the wide and tortuous streams of your Southern States. This, however, is a charity never intended for the Federal Government to assume, and it should not be made a part of the law of the land.

The bill is wrong in principle, vicious in its details, and filled with unfair and improper provisions. The condition of our Treasury is such that a special kind of bookkeeping, never before heard of, and which has been thoroughly explained on this floor, is needed in order to show any balance in the Treasury at all. The Shackleford bill appropriates $25,000,000 annually, performing thereby an arithmetical stunt of taking something from where there is nothing.

The Democratic wise men are scratching their heads and using their gray matter in order to discover some new form of taxation that will rest heavily on New England and lightly on the States where we are to build Federal roads, and if they can find these new methods of taxation, doubtless they will be willing to add this $25,000,000 in order that one plank of the Baltimore platform may be put into effect rather than broken to shreds, as nearly all of them have been by the present administration. This bill should, therefore, be beaten by the votes of the Members of this House.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary really for me to speak after the very strong statement and argument made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. No doubt the Government of the United States has the right to spend money upon post roads—I notice that this money is to be spent on any public road over which rural mail is or might be carried, and is rather indefinite—but even when the United States so spends money it is always recognized that the money ought to be returned by the locality. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] wisely pointed out the other day that the great Cumberland Post Road, a road responsible probably for the destruction of more than one administration, was paid for, not by the United States, but by the proceeds of public lands in the Northwest Territory. The great Pacific railroads were paid for by bonds issued by the United States. I think it was intended that the interest should be repaid by the roads, but the principal was repaid by the roads, and all other expenses were paid for by the proceeds of land grants to those railroads, with alternate sections benefited and reserved to the United States. If there is one thing in which a community ought to feel a pride and exercise its power, it is in the roads which it affords to its own people. If there is one thing that can not be safely trusted to a Secretary of Agriculture, maybe 3,000 miles away, it is the way that roads shall be built in your State and built in mine. It is impossible to deal fairly at such a distance. There are no less than three modes of distribution of the money of the Nation indicated in this bill. One part is equally given to each State, whether it contains so many thousands or so many millions of inhabitants. Half of the rest goes in proportion to population, and the other half in proportion to the mileage of rural free delivery roads appearing in the last report of the Postmaster General. Under his discretion to establish these roads this money, as far as half is concerned, can be distributed to what States he chooses, and under the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture it can be given to what localities he pleases within those States. Such an appropriation of public money, not by Congress but at the discretion of two Secretaries, is unknown in any bill, be it for public buildings or for rivers and harbors. I have no hesitation in speaking for my own State, because we are proud of what my State has done for good roads. We have been almost first in the United States to construct the best roads to be found anywhere to be used by everyone who travels from New York to Philadelphia, or from Pennsylvania to the seaboard, and we paid for them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DUNN. I yield two minutes additional to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We paid for them. I dare, therefore, to call attention to the fact that New Jersey, under this bill, is given $438,000 out of $25,000,000, according to the calculation at the end of the bill. It is 1.75 per cent, almost exactly. New Jersey's population is 2.75 per cent of the total population of the United States, and hers is not a population of idlers, for, according to the statistics, that State has 2.8 of the total number of people engaged in actual industrial occupations with their hands. She paid in 1914 of the internal-revenue taxes—which are the taxes we are raising now—3.6 per cent of the total amount. If this bill goes into operation, New Jersey will have contributed $900,000 of the $25,000,000, and she will get back $438,000 to be expended—not as she pleases, but as the Secretary of Agriculture shall adjudge. I do not think that this is fair to the people of my State. I do not believe that any other State wishes to take our money, and we do not wish to take theirs in order to do what is for our own local improvement. The greatest thing a State can have is good roads, but they are the possession of the State. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Under leave to extend his remarks, Mr. PARKER of New Jersey submitted the following:

New Jersey is glad to take care of her own roads, although in these days those roads are a free contribution to the automobile traffic of the whole Union which often crosses the State without stopping, so that New Jersey people receive no benefit.

If there is anything which ought to be taken care of by the locality, it is the roads, and the locality gets the benefit of those roads.

A strong objection to this bill is that it results in using the taxes collected in one State to pay for roads in other States. New Jersey is an example. The report, on page 6, shows that she would receive $438,054 out of an appropriation of $25,000,000, which is as nearly as possible 1¾ per cent. The same table shows that her population is 2,537,167 out of a total population of 91,641,197, or over 2¾ per cent.

By reference to the Statistical Abstract of 1914, page 235, it appears that she had 1,074,360 persons engaged in gainful occupations out of a total of 38,167,336, or over 2.8 per cent, and from the same table, on page 596, it appears that in 1914, New Jersey paid in internal revenue $13,829,051.13 out of a total of $380,800,893.96, or over 3.6 per cent; that is to say, New Jersey contributes a proportion of internal revenue which is over twice as much as she is allowed in this bill. These figures are simply submitted in illustration of one of the considerations so well set forth in the minority views.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, there probably is not in this House a person who is a more enthusiastic exponent of good roads than am I. But inasmuch as I can not see my way clear to favor this measure at this time, I think it is reasonable for me to ask the privilege of stating my reasons.

Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that the State of New York has not, at the present time, spent all of the hundred millions of dollars appropriated for her good roads, but it is a fact that the balance remaining has been allotted for these highways. We have, probably, as thoroughly an organized highway department, as comprehensive a system of highways, as exists in any other State in the Union. And with all this departmental efficiency, we still have difficulty in distributing this fund to the satisfaction of every person interested in the work.

Considering this fact, with the added burdens which have been put upon us by the Federal Government in the way of taxation, I believe, with the small returns to the Commonwealth which this bill indicates we will receive, and what we must share with the other States, we of New York, at least, must be pardoned if we object to the injustice and impracticability of such legislation.

More than that, we are just entering upon a struggle for a condition in this country which, if successful, as I hope it will be, will require all the ingenuity of the present directors of affairs to raise funds sufficient for its inception and progress. It is a matter, it seems to me, of greater importance than the question of whether or not a wealthy State, or a coterie of wealthy States, should put their hands in their pockets for the benefit of the highways of their poorer sisters. Not that we love them less, but we love the good name of our country more. Indeed, I believe the time has arrived, until at least we settle on some definite policy of what is to be done to insure by strength the peace of this country, that we should vote for no appropriation for other than the usual necessitous work. Until that question is settled, settled not only as to policy, but as to the amount of the expenditure and from whence the funds are coming, highways can wait, if need be. The welfare of the country at large is far more dear to the heart of the patriotic American, be he a resident of a small State or a great one.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS] has nine minutes which he reserved on Saturday, and I now yield to him.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I am so intensely interested in the good-roads propaganda, so vitally concerned in seeing a beneficent road system spread like a great web all over our country, reaching into the remotest nooks and corners of every part of our fair land, that I expect to give this bill my support, realizing at the time I do it that it has many defects and falls far short of what I would like to see incorporated in a bill of this character. And since those in charge of the bill have invited criticism of its provisions, I shall venture to point out what I deem to be a few of its defects. There are several defects to which I would like to call attention, but I take it that before I get through with the one to which I desire to direct my remarks my time will have expired. The title of this bill, so far as the State of Kentucky is concerned, is a misnomer. Ostensibly this bill is being passed for the purpose of rendering national aid to the various States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

That is ostensibly the object and the purpose of this bill. It is so expressed in the title of it. So far as the State of Kentucky is concerned, I desire to say that no such thing will happen in that Commonwealth. I desire to point out, if I can do it, that but a very small proportion of this Federal aid, if this bill passes and the money is afterwards appropriated, will go to the rural post roads in the State of Kentucky. Section 3 of the Shackleford bill provides that the money appropriated under this bill shall be expended in the various States in accordance with the laws of those States. In order to know, then, how this bill is going to work in the various States of this Union, we will have to know what the various State laws are on that subject. I am not familiar with them, except that I am more or less familiar with the road law on the statute books in the State of Kentucky. That road law is, in substance, this: That the entire road system of the State is under the control of the commissioner of roads. A 5-cent tax on each $100 worth of taxable property is set apart as a road fund. Before any county in the State can get any State aid the county has to be taxed twice—first on the road fund generally and then it has to put up dollar for dollar. For every dollar that the county puts up the State puts up a dollar. Then, when this money is put up, on what roads will it go?

Under the provisions of the Kentucky road law the only roads upon which the State can render any aid at all are those roads that lead from one county seat town to the county seat towns of the adjoining counties. These are the roads, and these are the only roads, upon which any State aid can go until all these various roads have been constructed. That being true, on what rural post roads will this Federal money be put in the State of Kentucky? Only on those post roads or State highways leading from one county seat town to the next county seat town, and it can not be put on them unless they are used as post roads. And that is the way this law will operate in my State. Not only that, but under our law this State road fund that every county is taxed to help put up will only go to the counties that take advantage of the provisions of the State law. The great majority of the counties in the State of Kentucky are not meeting the requirements of the State road law in that State. That being true, under the provisions of the Kentucky road law this State road fund, which would have gone to a certain county if it had met the requirements at the end of each year, goes back into the general road fund to go into the counties of the State that do meet the requirements.

And, further than that, the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore has this as one of its planks:

We favor national aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

To State and local authorities! This bill does not propose to give any part of this money to the local authorities, but to turn over the entire control of the entire sum to the various States of this Union.

Now, then, if any money should go to the State of Kentucky, if this bill passes and it should become a law—I reckon nobody seriously thinks it will become a law as long as the present occupant of the White House remains in power; of course, it will not become a law, and I reckon nobody is deceived about that—but if it should become a law and should be put upon the statute books of this country, the Kentucky money will go to the State of Kentucky as a State, and no part of it will go to the various counties in the Commonwealth. That being true, since it goes to the State and is a part of the State fund, then the various counties in the State, in order to take advantage of its provisions, will have to put up just as much money as they would have had to put up if this bill had never become a law at all. That is the way this bill is going to work and operate, so far as the State of Kentucky is concerned.

I am not familiar with the road laws of the various States of this Union, but I desire to call attention to the fact that under the provisions of this bill the Federal money will have to be applied in accordance with the laws of the State in which the Federal money is to go.

There are a good mony other features of this bill of which I do not at all approve. The idea of putting this money in the exclusive control of the various States and letting the Government have no sort of control over the money it appropriates after it puts it up, no sort of jurisdiction over the post roads on which it puts it money, is not advisable. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MONTAGUE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. JONES and Mr. LANE members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of Commerce.

RURAL POST ROADS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, how does the exact time stand now in respect to this debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN] controls 31 minutes and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] 64 minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield some time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, how much time did the Chair state is remaining to me?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 31 minutes.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill because I believe the Government has a right to appropriate money for this purpose, and because it is wise to do it. I represent a congested industrial district, with very few farmers in it. I would wish that we had many more farmers, on account of their great usefulness and the good citizenship they represent. But I feel that this appropriation will benefit the people in the industrial sections as well as those in the agricultural districts. Indeed, good roads are of such inestimable value to all classes that it is folly to attempt to particularize as to whom they will benefit.

Though Pennsylvania is a rich State, it has 90,000 miles of public highways. It has spent a lot of money in recent years to build roads and has extensive plans for the future, but much the larger part of that 90,000 miles is in a rough condition, and the $1,400,000 that will come from this appropriation to Pennsylvania will be exceedingly helpful in the colossal task that confronts that State in taking care of any reasonable part of this 90,000 miles.

With the 2,300,000 miles of public highways in the Nation and only a comparatively small portion of these arteries in proper condition, the vast means necessary in the large in area but less populous States for the construction of the needed modern road are beyond their reach. The rapid development of our country, its vast needs, together with the inconceivable requirements in food, raiment, and so forth, of its greatly increasing population make the means of transportation and distribution an ever-pressing question.

Cooperation between the Federal Government and the States will not only result in needed financial assistance to the States in their colossal road-building burdens but also in the benefits from the advancement made in the science of road making through the interchange of thought and experiences between the Nation and the States.

Notwithstanding our more than 300,000 miles of splendid railroads—nearly as much as all the rest of the world possesses—James J. Hill, the railway magnate and expert, has repeatedly stated that an expenditure of $500,000,000 a year for 10 years in railroad equipment would be necessary to meet the demands of our great growth, also adding that the time was not far distant when the artificial highways would not be equal to these requirements and that the natural highways of the watercourses must be utilized in this service. I doubt if the public highway, with its great possibilities in transportation by the use of the automobile, was in Mr. Hill's mind, but there are the 2,300,000 miles of public roads and millions of automobiles awaiting utilization in our giant strides of progress for the benefit of humanity.

The Government may well, properly and most usefully, lend a helping hand to the States in this great development for the common good. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. MILLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. MILLER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I have gone over the provisions of this bill very carefully and I have also listened assiduously to the debates on the bill in the last few days. I heard my friend from Texas [Mr. BLACK] say that surely the Delaware Member in this House should vote for this bill because of the proportionate amount of money it gave to the State of Delaware and the amount of roads there. Unfortunately I can not agree with him, and it is my intention to vote against the bill.

Representing as I do on the floor of this House the State at large, I feel that I should state a few of my reasons why I shall vote against it, although it looks like a good bill to people in a farming community. I beg to state that in Delaware there are far more country communities than there are urban; in other words, the State is almost wholly agricultural in its area. It would be a very easy matter for me to vote for this bill, because, apparently, it is in the interest of the country community. But, in my opinion, we should consider this measure not from the standpoint of the particular good it might do our own particular district or our own State, but we should consider it from the national standpoint as national legislators.

This bill provides $25,000,000, to be distributed all over the country. Why, gentlemen, to use a mining expression, the surface of the earth would hardly be scratched by this $25,000,000. I know it to be a fact that in the case of the few good roads that we have in my State, where we spend hundreds of thousands of dollars every year, if we should take advantage of this bill and receive the $103,000, or twenty-six one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the total amount, it would really do them no good when it came to actual constructive road building.

It is not my duty to call the attention of the Members on my side of the House to this bill, nor that of the people on the majority side, but I do not see how anybody, after listening to the address of the President of the United States at the opening of this Congress can conscientiously vote for this measure. Two very salient points were brought forth in that address by the President, namely, the question of national defense and the raising of additional revenue; and surely those Members on the Democratic side and those on our side who intend to support the President in national-defense matters can not vote for this measure that is brought in here before we have considered how that question is to be dealt with, pro or con, in this body.

And, furthermore, the majority, as all know in this House, is laboring to-day with one of the greatest dilemmas that has ever been put up to a party in power in deciding the question of how to raise the revenue necessary to run the Government for the remainder of this administration. At the end of the first fiscal year under this administration no one will deny that a deficit was shown in 1914, one month before the European war began, which made it necessary for the administration to resort to stamp taxes, about which our able leader of the minority [Mr. MANN] has spoken to-day.

I do not base my opposition to this bill on the conflict of interest between the country people and the city people, because, as I said before, I represent a State which is agricultural in area, all with the exception of one city. But, with the important questions that we have pending before us to-day, which were brought out in the President's address at the opening of this session, I do not see how any man can conscientiously vote for this bill.

With all due respect to the honorable committee that brought in this majority report, I wish to say that that report, as compared with the minority report prepared by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], is eloquent in what it did not say in favor of this bill rather than in what it did say in favor of it. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with the gentleman [Mr. MILLER of Delaware] who has just spoken. While this Government will no doubt make proper preparation for its national defense, it is not necessary that we should become hysterical upon that proposition. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is not necessary that we should abandon all propositions looking to the improving of our domestic conditions. This Government will move along smoothly, whatever troubles may forebode.

This is a proposition in which the overwhelming masses of the American people are profoundly interested. It carries authorization for an appropriation of $25,000,000 for the improvement of rural roads. In the limited time I have, of course, I can not enter into the discussion of the various objections made to this measure, but I desire to give it my hearty approval and indorsement and ask permission of the House to incorporate in the RECORD some extracts from a former issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, being part of a speech that I made upon this subject in the House about eight years ago. [Applause.]

I have been especially interested in the waterways improvement, but not more than in the improvement of public roads. Both are essential to the convenience, prosperity, and happiness of our people. Frequently I have discussed the question of Federal aid in the construction of public roads. I favor this bill, as I have favored others to lift the rural American population out of the mud and grant to them the benefits that necessarily follow improved highways. Perhaps I could not better express myself to-day on this question than I did on March 3, 1908, when I spoke in the House of Representatives on the amendment that I then proposed to the post-office and post-roads bill. The RECORD referred to of that date, pages 2824 and following, show in part what I then said on the subject of good roads, as follows:

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. After that section, Mr. Chairman, I shall offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask permission to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided further, That a sum not to exceed $500,000 of this appropriation may be expended by the Postmaster General, in cooperation with the Secretary of Agriculture, in improving the conditions of rural delivery routes to be selected by them, for the purpose of ascertaining the possible increase in the territory which could be served by one carrier, and the possible increase of the number of delivery days each year, the amount required for proper maintenance in excess of local expenditure for rural delivery routes, and the relative saving to the Government in the maintenance of rural delivery routes by reason of such improvements: Provided further, That the State or county or counties which may be selected for improvement of rural delivery routes therein under this provision shall furnish an equal amount of money for the improvement of the rural routes so selected."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. This amendment is possibly subject to the point of order that it is new law, and on the objection of a single Member of the House may be precluded from consideration under the rule. No such rule obtains in the Senate. That body may therefore act on this question in the public interest and force the House to its final consideration when the disagreeing votes of the two Houses are to be adjusted in conference. But the opportunity will be given to the House to act, if it will, as the amendment will be presented. That this amendment should become the law is essential in the public interest. It need not be concealed that the amendment, if not considered here, will be introduced and acted on in the Senate. Nor is it necessary to conceal the fact that it is intended as an experiment to ascertain the facts on which shall rest the beginning of a system of good roads throughout the United States. That it is to the supreme benefit of the people to have a complete system of good roads by Federal aid, if the same can be constitutionally obtained, is so clear that it is idle to discuss it. That such a system is needed for the expeditious transportation of overland rural mail must be clear when the almost intolerable condition of rural-route roads in the greater part of the country is known of all men, for expedition can not be had without such improvement. That the United States and the States or counties getting the benefit of the roads should jointly contribute to their improvement seems only to be just. That the United States and the States or counties are capable of gradually making the necessary road improvement I think will not be denied. That the increased wealth of the people in general, by reason of this needed internal improvement, will more than compensate for the expenditure is at least an incidental inducement to the expenditure, although, logically, it may seem not a justification for it when separated from postal necessities. Then, what is in the way of a modest beginning of this essential public work, which will be worth more to the masses of our people in direct and immediate benefits than the rivers and harbors and the Panama Canal combined? [Applause on the Democratic side.] So magnificent will be the result to our people living in the rural sections that it seems criminal to delay the beginning when the States and counties join, as they will join, in the improvement and share with the United States the benefits. Can it be said that Congress is without power? Shall it be said that it is an unwarranted interference in the affairs of the States? If either proposition could be maintained, then we should desist. If they can not be, why not begin the great work? The second proposition falls if the first can be overcome, because it is involved in it.

The United States is a Government of limited and delegated powers. Just such power as is conferred on Congress by the Constitution it may exercise, and such other power as may be fairly implied from the express power granted and necessary to carry it out. It is sovereign within the sphere of its constitutional jurisdiction; it is powerless outside of it. The State rights consist of the rights and powers that belong to a complete sovereign, save only those conferred on the United States in the Constitution. No State of this Union is therefore a complete sovereign, because it has yielded a part of its sovereign power to another political entity—the United States; and the United States is not a complete sovereignty, because there are sovereign rights that belong to the States—rights reserved and not yielded to the United States. The State is only a partial sovereign. The United States is only a partial sovereign. Their sovereign powers are distinct and separate. It takes both to make a complete sovereignty. In this is the strength of the dual system of government. In which government—State or Federal—rests the power to establish post roads? The United States Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, in section 8, subsection 7, Article I, gives to Congress the right to establish post offices and post roads. This delegation of power makes Congress supreme on this question. The grant of the power carried with it the right to exercise such other powers as are necessary to enforce the same. It follows that the United States could, by purchase or condemnation proceedings, obtain the right of easement or use in any land in any State for post-road purposes (which is a governmental purpose) not already in use by the State for State governmental purposes, just as the State can condemn United States lands for State governmental purposes not in actual use for United States governmental purposes. These questions have long since been settled by State and Federal judicial decisions. The power exists, therefore, in Congress to establish these roads for postal service by express terms of the Constitution. Who shall object to cooperation by the State or the county with the United States in a work in which is joint and mutual benefit? The machinery for the perfection of this work may be Federal or State, as may seem best. These are not new propositions. This is the time for action. There has been enough discussion. If gentlemen complain of the form of the amendment, offer a better suggestion, and let it pass. Let us know now who is for and who is against this system of internal improvement.

It may be that the parcel-post proposition will present itself for consideration under the bill. A parcel-post system confined to rural-delivery routes at a rate compensatory to the Government might prove beneficial; but, in my judgment, this is questionable until the rural routes are so improved as to make the delivery of parcels speedy and satisfactory. The people are demanding improved conditions in all branches of the public service, and where these are practicable, or can be made so, it is the duty of the Representatives to respond to the public demand.

Unfortunately, a great portion of our public men regard the development of Federal power as destructive of the rights of States. This is true if such development be questionable under the Constitution; but if the Constitution confers a power on Congress, the development and exercise of that power to its full limit by the Federal Government neither destroys nor impairs any right of the States, for such right is not reserved, and, being delegated to the United States, does not belong to the State. The more speedy the full and complete development of all Federal power and authority under the Constitution comes, the more accurate will be the lines of demarcation on all questions of jurisdiction between State and Federal Government, and the more readily will the governments, State and Federal, adjust themselves to their constitutional orbits, from which neither may come to encroach upon the other. These governments are not intended to be inimical, but wholly interdependent and cooperative, each maintaining and exercising separately their powers as determined by the Constitution. [Applause.]

When we improve our great waterways, concerning which there is but little difference of opinion, it is for the benefit of the people of the entire Union, but the people of the States where the harbors are, or through which the rivers flow, get the most direct benefits. What right has the United States Government to claim jurisdiction over all the navigable waters in the States and remove the obstructions to the transportation of commerce placed therein by nature? The Constitution confers the power. It is a Federal and not a State right exercised in the interest of commerce. The right to establish post roads in the State is also a Federal constitutional right. Why should it not be exercised in the interest of the expeditious delivery of mail to the people, and incidentally to the benefit of overland commerce? This power is now dormant. No legislative action has imparted vitality to it. It is one of those Federal powers not yet fully exercised. In my judgment, its exercise will be beneficial to the States and to the United States; and surely the exercise by the United States of one of its powers can not be held to impair State rights.

The United States has exclusive jurisdiction, as I said, over the navigable waters in the States—waters navigable in fact and not merely declared so by statute. It does not own the river bed over which the stream flows; this is the property of the State. It does not own the river banks; these belong to the landowners adjacent. It has no riparian rights. It does not even own the water in the stream, for it may be used by private individuals, unless its use should reduce the quantity of the water or the flow of the stream so as to impair navigation. The United States simply has the right to the use of the stream to maintain navigation. Its jurisdiction for securing and maintaining navigation is complete. It is an express power exercised in pursuance to the Constitution to secure the consummation of a particular purpose, and that purpose is navigation free to all the people of all the States. The power to carry the mails to all the people over any portion of any State in the Union belongs to the United States Government, and it may open up post roads for this purpose, but in so doing no part of the soil of the State would belong to the United States, but merely an easement or right of way on a chosen road to carry the mails. It would have no special jurisdiction over the roads; the State would reserve its civil and criminal jurisdiction. The United States would have no more right on the road than a citizen would have except for the improvement thereof in cooperation with State or county authorities and for carrying mail. The right to protect its mails it now has everywhere. The apprehensions of many on this question are ill-founded. Let us give to our country this initial step to the ultimate consummation of a perfected system of internal improvements which, in connection with our rivers and harbors and ship canal, will so develop and enhance our resources that this Republic shall become more wealthy and more powerful than all the nations of Europe combined. [Applause.]

This was only an experimental proposition, but the suggestion of the development of good roads by Federal aid was not strong enough then in the House to demand a majority. Its advocates have since been insistent, and in 1912 the House passed an amendment to the post office and post roads bill authorizing the appropriation of $25,000,000 for good roads. The Senate refused to agree to this item, and passed an amendment directing the chairman of the Senate and House Committees on the Post Office and Post Roads to appoint several special committees, including one on good roads, to which the House agreed. In the conference that followed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, the conference committee, of which I was a member on the part of the House, agreed on an experimental road fund of $500,000 under a suggestion similar to the one proposed by me on March 3, 1908. This was passed by both Houses and became a law—Public law No. 336. This was the same conference in which, by the direction of the other conferees, Senator Bourne, of Oregon, and myself drafted the parcel-post law, combining the provisions of my bill and amendments in the House and his in the Senate, and other provisions, which was adopted by Congress. On August 24, 1912, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 11850, the following appears:

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the committeees appointed by Mr. Moon of Tennessee, chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The committees appointed by Mr. Moon of Tennessee, chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives, under the act of August 24, 1912, making appropriation for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, were:

Committee on Pneumatic Tubes: Mr. BLACKMON of Alabama, Mr. Murdock of Kansas.

Committee on Second Class Mail Matter and Compensation for Railway Mail Service: Mr. LLOYD of Missouri, Mr. Tuttle of New Jersey, Mr. WEEKS of Massachusetts.

Committee on the Post Roads: Mr. SHACKLEFORD of Missouri, Mr. MCGILLICUDDY of Maine, Mr. LEE of Georgia, Mr. MADDEN of Illinois, Mr. AUSTIN of Tennessee. (RECORD, p. 11850, 62d Cong., 2d sess.)

The result of the work of the committee appointed on good roads was the establishment by Congress of a permanent Good Roads Committee in the House. That committee has presented to you the pending bill. It is not, perhaps, just what some of you may want, but it is a good measure and deserves the support of the House. It is the beginning in a more substantial way of a work that should have been commenced long ago, and should continue until it is accomplished. The experimental stage is passed. Good roads are recognized as a public necessity. The agricultural, commercial, manufacturing, and educational interests of the country must necessarily be expanded by a completed system of good rural roads. The constitutionality of the undertaking, the benefits to be derived from it, the advancement of the people in all that makes for their welfare so clearly appear that there ought not to be any opposition to the measure. But some insist that it is unconstitutional to do this work for the people. These need only to be referred to that section of the Constitution heretofore mentioned. It is not merely an implied power, it is an express grant and delegated power which Congress has the right to exercise. Some say that it is class legislation. Class legislation, while obnoxious, is not prohibited by the Federal Constitution. But can it be that legislation that benefits directly two-thirds of our population and indirectly the whole population be called class legislation? It was said that it would benefit the farmers and laborers only and is therefore class legislation. Were this true, it would not condemn but commend the bill to all thoughtful and just men.

The farmers and laboring people of our country constitute an overwhelming majority of our population, and yet they have had but little done for them in the way of Federal legislation. Who are they anyway? They live not upon their wits but as God commands "by the sweat of their brows." By their labor they furnish that upon which all mankind exists. Largely freed by constant work as they are from the machinations of idle minds, unsound and immoral thoughts and practices, they are our best citizens in times of peace and our best soldiers in time of war. [Applause.] It was their blood that purchased the Nation's liberty; it is their labor that maintains the Nation's power and greatness. Shall we deny the benefits of just legislation to them?

If I understand the sentiment of this House, it is not only our purpose to pass this measure to improve rural roads but to perfect the parcel-post system that it may be of still greater benefit to the farmer and to the general public and to establish a system of rural credits by which the farmer can secure at a low rate of interest, on long-term loans, money to purchase lands and make homes or to improve those he now owns. The time has happily passed when Congress dares longer to ignore the rights of the producing or laboring classes of this Republic. These measures are but the legitimate outgrowth of a true Democracy responding to the demands of the people for the improvement of national conditions among many measures proposed by the Democratic Party since its ascendancy to power in the United States. We must look to the advancement and the progress of our country along all lines, and we must not hesitate longer to protect the rural population of our country and to grant to them these demands to which they are entitled. What is $25,000,000 to this people, with the contribution of $25,000,000 more by the States annually for these purposes until accomplished? It sounds like a great deal, but it amounts to but little after all. Why, sirs, there is one bill that comes into this House that carries $320,000,000. It is for the interest of the American people everywhere, and the demand has always been made for progress in that great department of the Government which it provides for—the Postal Department. No greater demand and no greater necessity exists than this law for the establishment and the maintenance of post roads to carry the means of information from one end of this Republic to the other to the people, and I commend it to your favor. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I believe in internal improvements within the United States. I would much prefer to see our money spent here than to have it spent in foreign countries or in making toward the improvement of foreign countries or colonial possessions.

I believe in the improvement and the development of the waterways of the United States. We have 50,000 miles of waterways, navigable and nonnavigable, and only half of them improved. If they were all improved there would be less congestion in the great cities and more activity in the country. One of the reasons for the improvement of waterways is that railroads have taken the farmer away from the soil that God seems to have provided for him, to the lines of the railroads; there the people throng together, so that business is concentrated, while vast areas of the country go unpopulated and unused.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. Are we to understand that the gentleman is in favor of any plan to reduce the population of the City of Brotherly Love and drive them to the country?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not on normal grounds; but when it comes to undue congestion, I would say that it would be a good thing for the people of Philadelphia and a good thing for the people in the country, where farms are now begging for labor, if many of those who are not able to obtain as good a livelihood in the city as they could obtain on the farm, could be induced to leave the city and go to the farm. [Applause.]

The gentleman's question brings up the very interesting economic and sociological fact that the farmer, on the average, is progressing more successfully to-day than the delver in the city. It is a fact sometimes overlooked in our debates. In the district I have the honor to represent, there is probably not an acre of unimproved ground. Everything except the streets and the public squares is built over. Yet there, in the hurly-burly of the people, rushing to work in the morning and rushing back at night, there are thousands whose positions are not so good as they would be on the farm, whose earning power is not so great, and whose lives would be happier and healthier if they were in the country. They do not do so well on the back streets and alleys of a great city as they usually do upon the farm. I have mentioned this before.

But, coming back to waterways, I believe in the improvement of waterways, because it would open up new stretches of country that have been unpopulated even since colonial times. It is not commonly known that one-half the arable land in the area of the thirteen original States is still awaiting the settler, or the coming of the tiller of the soil. Even as you are discussing irrigation in the West; even as you are proposing reclamation for other sections, we still have this eastern land available, already irrigated and awaiting the settler.

Now, if it is a good thing to open up the 148 rivers that traverse the Atlantic seaboard, as I contend it is, to say nothing of the tens of thousands of navigable miles of river elsewhere, would it not be a good thing also to give our assistance to the opening up of good roads, which also induce the urban population to become suburban, and which give encouragement to the man who tills the soil. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is a member of the Ways and Means Committee, from which we must expect legislation to provide this $25,000,000. I wonder if the gentleman would be betraying any secrets of the committee if he would inform the House where this money is to come from.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a question of responsibility that I am leaving to the majority, who have not yet unfolded their plan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I simply want to add, in the interest of fairness and from the national viewpoint, that the city and the country could get together more quickly and there would be a better understanding all along the line if we should open up the avenues of communication and make transportation easier by rail, by road, and by water. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, our National Government early in its beginning favored national aid for good roads. The policy was continued and maintained until 1840. Then it was abandoned. There was no question at that time in the minds of the early statesmen of our country about the constitutionality of national aid for good road purposes. They were mainly the very men who had the making of the Constitution itself, and as there was no serious criticism or division of opinion at that time on the subject, I do not think there should be in this day and generation.

I was gratified to hear the statement of the gentleman from the great city of Philadelphia, Mr. MOORE, and I think he properly stated this proposition. This is not a contest between the city and country; this is a great national question involving the development and upbuilding of the entire country. We could not possibly have the city prosperous without the country being prosperous, and, on the other hand, we could not build up the country districts without the city receiving the benefit from it. We have an immense empire extending from ocean to ocean—3,000,000 square miles, with an average population of 30 to the square mile. The great burden of providing national highways, for cheap transportation, for building up our country, for making rural life more agreeable and more attractive, is too stupendous a financial burden upon the States and local communities to carry forward without the assistance of the National Government. If Congress could give millions of valuable acres of land out of the public domain for the construction of railroads and thus aid in building up the western country, I think we have reached the point where Congress can appropriate money out of the Public Treasury to still further the development of our country and the prosperity of the rural districts of all the States of the Union. [Applause.]

It is no excuse to say where is the money coming from. I have great respect for the leader of my party, but if that argument should prevail against this proposition, the question of how the majority are going to raise this revenue by a "stamp tax" we will prevent this House from practically doing anything in view of the fact that we have at present a deficit in the Treasury.

When we come to pass on the President's recommendation to expend $300,000,000 to put the country in a proper defensive state and give us an increase in the Army and an effective Navy, then those of us who believe it is a patriotic duty of Congress to make provision for a larger Army and an adequate Navy can not shirk or avoid our patriotic duty in this House by stopping to question or consider whether the taxation in order to meet that expense is going to be a stamp tax or some other tax that is unpopular. The public sentiment of this country I have found to be overwhelmingly, and has been for many years, that out of the billion dollars we vote out of the National Treasury we should vote a portion of that for the great national undertaking of the construction in connection with the States and counties of a public-road system. [Applause.]

I favor raising the necessary money for this and other needed legislation by increasing our tariff duties and not by a stamp or direct tax.

I recently made a trip to the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands, and one thing which attracted my attention more than anything else and which I think was a great agency for developing these new colonial possessions was the system of magnificent highways constructed in the islands. They have made them blossom like the rose. What we have done there in that line has received the commendation and the admiration of the world. If we can go seven or eight thousand miles away from our native shores to inaugurate an improvement which has developed these islands, why can not we begin our charity, our patriotism, and our good work right here in the 48 States of the American Union? [Applause.]

The farmers of this country have had nothing out of the National Treasury of direct observable benefit except the rural delivery system. They are expecting, and have a right to expect, rural credit legislation, and in connection with that, the inauguration of national aid for good roads. There are several changes I would favor making in this bill, but if not made in the House we can urge the Senate to make them. Let us do something for good roads now. Let us make a beginning, and later we can amend or improve the law. One objection I have to this bill is that it does not carry a larger sum of money than $25,000,000. It ought to be $50,000,000, and we should appropriate as much money for roads annually as we do for rivers and harbors. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GORDON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 3518. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

RURAL POST ROADS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, what policy shall be adopted by Congress respecting national-road legislation? The opinion is almost unanimous among the Members of both Houses that good roads are a necessity; that it is desirable that the Federal Government contribute in some measure to their construction and maintenance, and that ample authority is found in the Constitution to permit appropriations by Congress for this purpose. The only question is as to the method of procedure.

In common with a number of other Congressmen, I have introduced a bill to provide for national aid to the several States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads, and while the pending measure does not entirely conform to my idea of what a good roads bill ought to be, yet I intend to give it my heartiest support because I know that the Committee on Roads has given most careful consideration to this legislation. Like most all of the other bills, the Shackleford bill contemplates an annual expenditure of $25,000,000 for road construction and maintenance by the Federal Government, to be apportioned among the States and to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The Secretary will apportion the money appropriated among the States, after deducting a sum necessary for administrative purposes and a further sum sufficient to provide for an allotment of $65,000 to each State, on the basis of population and the mileage of rural post roads and star routes. In this respect the pending measure differs from the bill which I introduced. It appears to me that it would be more equitable to the Western States to apportion the money—one-third according to the number of Senators and Representatives to which each State respectively is entitled in Congress, one-third in accordance with the ratio which the area of each State bears to the area of the United States, and the remaining one-third according to the mileage of rural delivery and star routes. I have no doubt, however, but that the committee had good reasons for adopting the method of dividing the appropriation as provided in this bill.

The bill before us very properly provides that in allotting Federal aid the Secretary of Agriculture shall deal with the States as units and not with the counties or other subdivisions, as has been proposed in the bills which passed this House on former occasions. After groping around learning costly lessons by experience, we have finally reached the conclusion that there is too much local control in the business of building roads. The most efficient plan that has as yet been devised in the United States for the construction and maintenance of public roads is to create a State highway department. Over one-half the States have already adopted this method of supervising their road work, and the passage of this bill means that before very long every State in the Union will provide by law for a State highway department or a State highway engineer having authority to supervise and direct the construction and maintenance of the public roads and highways of the State.

According to the terms of this bill the State highway departments will submit plans of proposed construction to the Secretary of Agriculture, who will then determine in each case the proportion of the estimated cost to be borne by the Federal Government, which shall not be less than 30 nor more than 50 per cent, the balance to be contributed by the State. The money expended by the States on road work is raised by direct taxation. By requiring the States to contribute from one-half to two-thirds of the cost of any road the Federal Government obtains the advantage of the watchfulness by the taxpayers of the State over State expenditures, because the State highway departments can not waste Federal appropriations without also wastefully expending State funds.

Pleas for economy have always fallen on deaf ears in Congress. The fear of an empty Treasury is the only check on appropriations. If all of the revenues of the Government, however, were raised by a tax on incomes, the profession of watch dog of the Treasury would soon be as popular at Washington as it now is in the State legislatures. It is said that at present the best insurance for a long congressional career is never to vote to increase a direct tax or to reduce an appropriation. Since the sentiment for economy in Congress is purely academic, it is certainly the part of wisdom to enlist the support of the payers of direct taxes in the States in guarding the expenditure of Federal road funds.

By recognizing and encouraging the establishment of State highway departments we permit each State to solve its own road problems. The State of Maine is one of the summer playgrounds of the Nation, and the people there find that it is profitable to build roads for the use of tourists who come to enjoy the climate and the scenery. Kansas is no summer resort, but the farmers of that Commonwealth produce enormous crops of corn and wheat, that are expensive to market when the roads are bad. A system of highways designed for Maine would give poor satisfaction in Kansas. Why should not each State be permitted to use the funds received from the Federal Treasury in the manner that will serve its people best?

There is no sound basis for the fears of those who believe that State control of highway construction means that interstate roads will not be built. They insist that main lines of railroads were built first and the branch lines came afterwards. This statement is not historically correct, except as to the land-grant railroads of the West, and their prompt completion to the Pacific coast as a military necessity was stimulated by the aid received from the United States. Every large railway system east of the Mississippi is made up of a number of short lines that have been united into through routes. These combinations were not made until the traffic between distant points reached such a volume that through trains were necessary. Whenever interstate travel by automobiles reaches such proportions that continuous highways are demanded, then the State highway departments will not have any great difficulty in agreeing upon common meeting points on the State boundary lines. The American people will ultimately get all the highways that they want, but the kind of roads they need most will be obtained first.

I am glad that section 5 of this bill contains the following language:

> * * * that the roads which may be constructed or maintained under the provisions of this act shall include earth, sand-clay, sand-gravel, and other common types of roads, as well as roads of higher classes; one of the purposes of this act being to encourage and promote the improvement of a general system of roads leading from cities, towns, and railway stations into the adjacent farming communities.

Let us not despise the dirt roads, for they are like the common people whom "God must love, because he has made so many of them." In our hope for highways of perfect construction, we should not fail to give consideration, if not praise, to this humble servant of internal commerce. As Gov. Major, of Missouri, than whom there is no better friend of good roads, said in his remarks to the Committee on Roads at the hearings last year—

> It is the dirt road, representing the first leg of the journey, and over which moves the traffic of the Republic, that serves the Nation most. These roads reach out like tentacles into the country life, and their improvement will mean more than any other one achievement which can be brought about. The farmer, when he makes a haul, must gauge his load not by the macadam road over which he passes a part of the distance, but by the bad dirt road he must travel. When it comes to determining what character of roads shall receive Federal aid, I ask what are you going to do about the dirt road—the real road of the people?

There will be some objection to the improvement of dirt roads with appropriations from the Federal Treasury by those who favor the construction of highly improved national highways connecting the State capitals and large centers of population, but, in my opinion, the national-highway advocates are now willing to accept this bill as a compromise. Personally I have never countenanced the abuse that has been heaped upon the heads of those who hope to see this country gridironed with highly improved touring roads. It has been charged that the sentiment for national highways has been fostered and organized by the manufacturers of automobiles and road-making machinery. Associated with them are the owners of patents for road materials and the makers of blasting powder. It is said that, in order to influence public opinion, representatives of these industries secure appointments as delegates to good-roads conventions and that money is furnished to pay the expenses of organizers who travel over the country laying out routes for national highways. No one has suggested that there is anything wrong in all this activity except that subscriptions have been collected in some towns that were left off the routes as afterwards located.

In truth, the work done by these manufacturers in behalf of national highways has served a most useful purpose. They have promoted the organization of highway associations all over the country and convincing arguments in favor of better roads have been given the widest publicity. The American Automobile Association, in its advocacy of national highways, has also rendered a great service. There was no real good-roads movement in America until this association and others interested in the construction of improved ways of travel put their shoulders to the wheel. The only legitimate criticism that can be made against this demand for national construction of highways is that it comes from a special interest and does not take into consideration the needs of all the people.

The Committee on Roads has been criticized for defining a "rural post road" to mean "any public road over which mail is or might be carried," but I believe that the committee acted wisely in adopting this language instead of confining Federal appropriations to roads actually used in the delivery of the United States mail. Rural-delivery routes begin and end at the same place—the post office. They go out in circuits and follow for only a part of the way the market roads that the farmers use to reach the trading centers. To confine Federal aid to the rural-route mileage, as provided in former bills, would not assist the commerce of any community, because the average load would still be measured by the unimproved condition of the intermediate roads. Continuous roads not only serve the public better but they are much cheaper to maintain. All public roads and highways, while kept up and maintained as such, have been declared by law to be post routes. This declaration was proper because every road is potentially a post route. Endless delay would ensue if a special act of Congress were necessary every time a new rural route was established or an old route changed to cover new territory. It is neither wise nor necessary that the expenditure of Federal funds be limited to the roads actually traveled by a rural carrier, roads that go zigzagging over the country, dodging around among the section lines.

According to the table printed as a part of the report of the Committee on Roads favorably recommending the passage of this bill, Arizona will be entitled to a total allotment of $117,512 each year. There is no doubt in my mind that the State of Arizona will make excellent use of this money. The legislature of my State has provided for an annual tax levy sufficient to raise the sum of $250,000 as a State road fund, so that we have the money available for the State's share of the cost of any road approved by the Secretary of Agriculture. Arizona has also provided for a State highway department under the supervision of a State engineer, so that we can meet the requirements of this bill in the matter of dealing with the State as a unit.

In all frankness, I must say that there is some division of sentiment among the people of my State as to just what should be done in the way of legislation providing for Federal aid in the construction of good roads, but I have explained to everyone who has asked me that I intended to vote for any good roads bill that might be placed upon its passage. I am anxious to see something done by Congress to assist the States in this most important work, and the only way to get Federal aid is to appropriate the money from the Treasury. Undoubtedly experience will teach us that some features of this bill should be changed, but we can safely leave the perfection of our highway legislation to future Congresses. There never will be a better time to initiate this policy than at the present moment. The Spaniards have a proverb which says that "the road to to-morrow leads to the house of never"; let us talk no longer about "Mañana," but do it now. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. OAKEY].

Mr. OAKEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this interesting discussion has seemed to be a sort of forum for new Members, and that is my excuse for these few words. I am not concerned, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, that this bill was a part of the platform written at Baltimore, because that interesting document has been relegated to the field of political fiction by Executive order. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I am not going to discuss the fact that we all want good roads, because it is an axiom—we all do. I was born on a farm in the congressional district of President Wilson, and one of the great trials of my young life was the bad roads of that community. Coming to Washington, I found that macadam roads now surround that farm, built by taxpayers through a very efficient State organization of the great State of New Jersey. I now have the honor in part to represent another one of that cluster of States that were the pioneers in good road building. We have now a very efficient State organization. We have spent many millions of dollars, and are preparing in the future to spend many more, to make our highways worthy of the splendid history of our little State.

We do not think it quite fair, my friends. I have noticed on this floor that all of those States that have not been efficient in road building, that have not established public-highway commissions, that have been laggard, perhaps, in this great improvement, are in favor of this bill. Our people have been taxed, and particularly those who ride behind gasoline engines, for the splendid improvement of the highways of our State, and we do not think it quite fair that we should pay at least a part of the burden of those who have not done so.

That this is a question concerning the movement of great military adventures in the future I do not believe. I do not think that that is a serious problem in this discussion; but, my friends, as an inexperienced Member I could not help but think, in the last few days of this discussion, of where we are going. Within the last few days I have heard discussed on this floor propositions of Federal aid for various and divers things—aid to fight the chestnut blight, aid to fight the citrus canker, aid to fight the rabies in coyotes of the Northwest, special educational aid, special sanitary aid for the rural districts, to which appropriations I do not object collectively. I have therefore wondered when and where it will stop. It seems to me that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois got at the meat of this situation. Can this Government, under its present condition and what seems imminent to us in the future, afford to levy more stamp taxes to build rural roads? Is it not rather the obligation of those who surround and live along those highways to do as we have done, and with pride for their States and their communities at least attempt to inaugurate the same system?

I believe that this bill will not only be used to inaugurate this system in the States which have not already done so, but that it is the hope that the Federal aid will be asked and instituted to continue it, and I appeal to you, my colleagues, that it is not fair, that it is dangerous, to go further.

A gentleman on the other side a few moments ago said, "What is $25,000,000 in a movement like this?" Twenty-five million dollars is a lot of money in the present state of the Federal Treasury. [Applause.] Therefore I ask that in the name of fairness, that in the name of our future difficulties, financial and otherwise, we be a little careful rather than that we give so much solicitude to the populistic appeal to the people, that we give a little more care in safeguarding the Treasury of this great Republic against possible contingencies that seem likely to arise. [Applause.]

I am not particularly interested in the constitutionality of the proposition, because, in the first place, I do not know whether it is constitutional or not, and, in the second place, that ancient document has become irrelevant among friends.

The proposition to build roads in rural communities has many times been considered in this House. If the proposition to expend $25,000,000 as an initial performance is successful, it is perfectly apparent that future appropriations for this purpose will be very large. I am, therefore, very strongly of the opinion that this is a bad precedent and an unfortunate time for such legislation.

The number and variety of our tax laws are not only becoming a burden but an irritating feature of our daily life. In my judgment, the stamp tax is the most odious of them all. If the tremendous expenditures now asked by the administration are in any sense to be put into force, this so-called stamp tax will be indeed a thing of beauty and a joy forever. This bill asks for an appropriation of $25,000,000 to build roads in communities where in some sense, I think, they ought to do it themselves. This is my principal objection to the bill under consideration.

[By unanimous consent, Mr. OAKEY was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I am an advocate of the general proposition connected with the question of good roads. I have some slight knowledge of their construction, and have been associated with good-roads legislation in my own State.

In the locality which I have the honor to represent in part we have some 350 miles of State roads. Those State roads are approximately portions of what will eventually be a trunk-line system.

We also have a system of county roads, which are under the supervision of a commissioner, for which county appropriations are made for maintenance, and which are in no sense State roads.

This bill seeks to authorize a Federal-aid appropriation of $25,000,000 for road construction in the several States. There is, to my mind, a very great difference between Federal aid for roads and Federal construction of roads.

Four things are clearly defined in the bill, the balance are stated in rather vague and indefinite terms. First comes the $25,000,000 item; second, that amount is to be placed in the hands of a department official; third, by a system of gift distribution the amount is to be divided among the several States; and, fourth, that after such division is made control of the same is lost to the Federal authorities.

If this measure was seeking to put into operation an initial system of Federal trunk-line roads there would seem to be little or no objection to the proposition, but under the circumstances it does not appear to me that it is an opportune time to enact the measure now reported.

Reference has been made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], in his brilliant speech, to the fact that the larger States, and particularly New York, should have no hesitancy in giving part of their means to assist the other States. I will say that I believe New York State has always been a cheerful divider. As far as my knowledge goes, I think that no Federal appropriation has been afforded to the State or city of New York which has not been more than doubly repaid by either direct or indirect participation in the Government revenues. Furthermore, the subject of good roads is not a vital question at the present time nor is it one that has to be solved immediately. This Chamber is supposed to be the financial office as well as the legal office of this Government. We are expected to be careful of our own expenditures and to be rather more than careful about voting away the money of other people.

If instead of a minus Treasury we had a plus Treasury, if we had large revenues that provided for a surplus that could be fairly divided, if we were not confronted with complications throughout the world that may call for large appropriations to be made by this Congress, to be expended for what might be called involuntary expenditures, it possibly might be a proper time to consider this measure; but in view of the fact that we have little or no surplus, that we are already considering increasing our present internal taxation, I believe this entire subject should be deferred until matters of much graver importance are definitely settled. Believing as I do that this is not a good business measure to present at this time I can not, under the circumstances, justify myself in supporting the same.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to use the remainder of his time?

Mr. DUNN. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Seven minutes.

Mr. DUNN. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from New York that he has two minutes remaining.

Mr. DUNN. I yield back that time, Mr. Chairman.

[Mr. SHACKLEFORD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of this committee comes from a part of the country which can not be expected to understand Massachusetts. In Massachusetts we have had the civilization of the public school; we have had free labor; we have built our own roads; we have been industrious; and we have been saving. The gentleman comes from that part of the country in which he was brought up under the civilization of the shotgun; that part of the country where the people, his forbears, thought that the only proper relation between capital and labor was that capital should own labor in fee simple. And so, Mr. Chairman, they have accumulated no money in his part of the country. I am sorry to say it is their own fault, and no wonder they wish to vote it out of other people's pockets. I have been in the House a good many years, and I have never yet, when I intended to speak of a man in debate, failed to notify him beforehand so that he might be present. I have read over and over again the rule which forbids personalities in debate, but the gentleman from Missouri was very successful some years ago when he reeled like a drunken man up and down this floor, imitating the leader of his own party because, forsooth, he was left off from a committee that he thought he deserved to be put upon. [Applause on the Republican side.] And since that time the gentleman has been so often indulging in personal remarks that he has forgotten they are against the rule. Now, let me say to the gentleman that no matter who it is in this House, on either side, the man who says that the motives of those of us who are backing this movement for preparedness are on account of a desire to keep up any stock, or every stock, of any ammunition manufacturers speaks with an unclean mouth. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Missouri a question. While the language to which he has called attention in this amendment is perfectly understood by those of us who are here to vote upon it, is it not true that the language could be construed to apply to any city street, New York or Chicago, if anywhere in that street a strip of street might be found on which the houses were not less than 200 feet apart, so as to be carried further than the intent of the amendment?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It undoubtedly could, if the gentleman assumes both the State highway department and the Secretary of Agriculture would be guilty of bad faith. It can not be done without their consent. It could only be done with both of them approving it, which is hardly possible. We must impute good faith to the officers who have power conferred upon them, and I believe they will administer it according to the spirit of the law.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree to that; but it seems to me that the language could be made so clear that even a man who did not want to act in good faith could not misinterpret it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I desire to submit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment. Page 1, line 9, after the word "thousand," insert "five hundred."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment to the committee amendment is to make it read "twenty-five hundred inhabitants" instead of "two thousand." I do it for this purpose: For a good many years the Census Bureau has been classifying rural and urban communities as follows: Those under 2,500 inhabitants as rural communities; those over 2,500 as urban. The thought of the people of this country has run along that line. Thousands of reports, essays, editorials, histories, and other documents have been issued, as well as thousands of speeches delivered, based upon the thought that 2,500 inhabitants is a fair, though an arbitrary, dividing line between urban and rural communities. Two thousand might just as well be taken for the dividing line in the bill if it were not for the long usage of the several departments of the Government, especially the Census Bureau. All the accumulated figures with reference thereto are in the line of 2,500 instead of 2,000. I think it ought to be accepted by the committee. I understand that 2,500 was selected by the Census Bureau from a long line of observation, covering years, that up to about that limit the towns served the immediate demands and purposes of the surrounding communities, but did not extend trade or influence beyond the next neighboring towns; that ordinarily towns of larger population became manufacturing centers and became subject to manufacturing and transportation influences, and because inhabited by manufacturing and transportation people these towns became commercial centers and spread their sphere of influence and trade beyond their immediate urban neighbors.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Two thousand is a perfectly arbitrary number placed there.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. As far as I am individually concerned, I see no difference between 2,000 and 2,500.

Mr. SLOAN. It would conform to the census practice and with the various documents they have given out for many years when distinguishing and talking about rural communities.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I am not authorized by the committee to accept the amendment, but individually I see no difference between 2,000 and 2,500. It is merely arbitrary now.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, there are one or two propositions in this amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri to which I would like to call the attention of the committee. There is a feature in the last two lines of the amendment that has been handed around, which says:

That not more than $25,000,000 shall be appropriated under the provisions of this act for any fiscal year.

It seems to be an attempt on the part of this House to limit the appropriations to the mere trivial sum of $25,000,000 a year for future Congresses. Now, the result of this amendment, if it should be adopted, would be that this would become permanent law, and next year when I offer an amendment in the next Congress to increase this appropriation from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 for that purpose, and the year after next when the gentleman from Missouri moves to increase the appropriation from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman is an optimist.

Mr. HOWARD (continuing). It would be subject to the point of order. Now, I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is a bad amendment to adopt, because we all believe and feel when this horrible European war is over that the nations of the earth will get together and establish a court of arbitration for the settlement of future differences; that the navies and the great standing armies of the countries will be gradually disarmed each year until there will be no more navies or armies in existence, and all the tremendous sums we are appropriating now for the maintenance of the Army and Navy can be used upon public highways and in building up the material welfare of the country. For that reason I hope there will not be included in this bill the language:

That not more than $25,000,000 shall be appropriated under the provisions of this act for any fiscal year.

Mr. HOPWOOD, Mr. KENT, and Mr. WINGO rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPWOOD].

Mr. HOPWOOD. Mr. Chairman, possibly what I have to say will not be worth saying, but I have some feeling about this measure that I desire to express. To begin with, I feel the gentleman from Missouri went far afield in attacking the gentleman from Massachusetts and the State of Massachusetts. I have had the pleasure of standing under that old elm tree up there, and I have had the pleasure of standing at Concord Bridge and at Bunker Hill, and any man who can stand at any one of those places and not feel patriotism rise within his breast and make of him a nobler and better man is not a true American. [Applause.]

I do not agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] in all he said the other day when he was arguing for preparedness here. I am for preparedness. He has made a study of that question, and he gave figures to support his contention. He has gone into the matter so fully that I was delighted to hear him. With much of what he said I agreed. We probably will find, however, that we will not wholly agree with any man here as to his opinion on any particular subject. However, I think we have gone far afield when we have brought in our differences of opinion on preparedness on such a peaceful thing as a road. I am for this bill, or I was. [Laughter.] I am sorry to be at difference, the first time I come here, with the leader on my side of the House. I am sorry that the question of the city and country comes up here. I am neither from the city nor from the country. I am from a town of about 15,000 people, which is neither one nor the other.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPWOOD. I will.

Mr. MANN. One of the unfortunate things about being the selected leader of a party is that very often upon matters that are totally nonpartisan, such as this one, the leader of a party is put in an embarrassing position. I never have felt in the House that I should be deprived of the right to express a personal opinion, because gentlemen might be afraid that I would soon speak as the Republican leader on the floor. I will say to my friend, and to all other Republicans, that there is no party question involved in this measure that I know of. I hope gentlemen will not feel that they are under the slightest obligation to vote the way I do, however I vote, upon such a proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPWOOD. That relieves a new Member very much. However, I thought this question was nonpartisan. I so viewed it, and I felt that each Member had a right to a personal opinion on the question.

So just a word about it. I happen to live on the old Cumberland Road, which was the first road and the greatest road ever built in this country by the National Government. I came across those mountains the other day when coming to the session of this Congress, and I left my town—Uniontown, Pa.—on the farther side of the mountains—the western ridge of the mountains—in the morning at 9 o'clock, and I arrived here at 6 o'clock in the evening, simply because that old Cumberland Road is kept in such a magnificent condition that it is as good as your magnificent streets here in the city, and I came flying over at the rate of 30 or 40 miles an hour.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What is the Pennsylvania speed limit?
